Pesticide

The University's Cooperative Extension Service has published a training manual outlining things potential pesticide users need to know to pass the certification test.

Passing the test primarily involves knowing how to use pesticides safely, said Donald C. Cress, professor of entomology and extension pesticide coordinator.

"Pesticide' is an umbrella term used to describe a number of different chemicals used to control pests," Cress said

According to the manual, in addition to being classified for general or restricted use, pesticides are commonly classified according to the effects they are designed to produce.

For example, residual herbicides are pesticides designed specifically to kill plants. They are soil-applied chemicals, which remain active for varying time periods. In contrast, a translocated herbicide essentially moves within a plant after being applied directly to its foliage.

Laws regarding pesticide use, such as FIFRA, are typically geared toward balancing the need for pesticides against the need to protect people and the environment from pesticide misuse, Cress said.

Government regulation of pesticide use is vital, he said, because pesticide misuse often threatens humans, wildlife and the environment. According to World Health Organization statistics, pesticides account for 500,000 poisonings and 20,000 deaths worldwide each year. Furthermore, the EPA reports that pesticides account for 40,000 poisonings and 200 deaths annually in the United States.

According to the CES manual, children under 10 years of age are the victims in at least half the accidental pesticide deaths in the United States.

Although accidental deaths caused by pesticides most commonly occur when someone drinks or ingests a chemical pest control, according to the manual, death and injury can also result, for example, from inhaling pesticide vapors.

Educating potential pesticide users about the dangers involved with using chemical pest controls lessens the threat pesticides pose to humans, wildlife and the environment, Cress said.

Education is also the key to successful federal regulation, he said, but requiring pesticide users to know more about chemical pest controls does not necessarily indicate more farmers will have to become certified or go to college to be successful at farming, he said.

"(Regardless of an individual's profession) more and more education is being required to get anywhere," Cress said. "But farmers who don't want to become certified will just hire somebody (who is certified) to apply the pesticide for them."

If used properly, every pesticide registered with the federal government can be used safely, he said.

According to the CES manual, applicants who pass the test are certified for five years, after which time they may renew their certification for successive five-year periods by passing open book tests.

According to Kansas law, private certification entitles an individual to use or supervise the use or application of any restricted pesticide used in the following situations:

- On any property owned or rented by the certified individual or his or her employer.
- On the property of another person as long as the certified individual receives no compensation for supervising the application of the pesticide.

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 7 poor men in the military, forcing them to suppress the other poor so they can keep economic power to themselves.

"No soldier is obliged to obey an order against the law of God," Romero says. "No one has to fulfill an immoral law."

Duigan cuts between highly contrasting scenes to emphasize his idea. The poor play guitars and marimbas at Mass while the rich listen to string quartets at parties. The poor demonstrate in city squares while the rich eat hors d'oeuvres and plan acts of repression. When Romero is made archbishop, the rich give him an ornate iron cross while the poor give him shoes.

Romero's own character seems almost superhuman. He doesn't cry when his friends are killed. He doesn't let us in on his thinking, he simply stands silhouetted in doorways and emerges later with his decision to act.

"Romero," although about El Salvador and filmed in Mexico, is in English. While perhaps detracting from the realism, the lack of subtitles makes the film easier to enjoy. The 1989 film is rated PG-13 and lasts 105 minutes. It will be shown at 7 p.m. today in Forum Hall, 3:30 p.m. Thursday in the Little Theatre and 7 p.m. Thursday in Forum Hall. Admission is $1.75.

Pentagon warned of building pressures to oust ROTC programs from colleges

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Major universities are warning the Pentagon that a military policy barring homosexuals from service is generating pressure to oust ROTC from campuses.

"The contradiction between the university's principle of nondiscrimination against individuals on the basis of sexual orientation, and the presence of an ROTC that does discriminate, cannot exist on the campuses indefinitely," John M. Deutch, provost of the Massain a letter to Defense Secretary Dick

"Many universities will withdraw from the ROTC program," Deutch

The Department of Defense has declined to comment on the campus

Maj. Doug Hart said that because the policy is being challenged in court the department has limited responses to a written statement outlining the reasons for barring homosexuals.

The military contends that homosexuality is incompatible with military service because of the close quarters in which people of the same sex must live and because of the security risk posed by the possibility of a homosexual officer being blackmailed.

Top administrators, faculty groups and students from MIT, the University of Wisconsin, University of Minnesota, Northwestern University chusetts Institute of Technology said and others have actively campaigned against the Reserve Officer Training Corps policy.

> The ROTC, in the past year, has denied several gay cadets their officer's commission and sought repayment of thousands of dollars in scholarship money.

Pesticides vary as toxic threats

By Bryan Ackley Science Reporter

Pesticides have to be poisonous to kill unwanted insects and other pests, but there is much debate among scientists about the degree to which chemical pest controls pose a toxic threat to humans.

There is no debate, however, about whether pesticides are toxic. According to World Health Organization statistics, among humans, pesticides account for 500,000 poisonings and 20,000 deaths around the world each more, the Environmental Protection Agency reports pesticides account for 40,000 poisonings and 200 deaths annually in the United States.

Further-

Trying to determine the level of a given pesticide's toxicity, which is a chemical pest control's inherent capacity to cause injury or death, is a complicated task, said Donald Cress, professor of entomology and extension pesticide coordinator.

Testing a chemical pest control's toxicity involves exposing rats and other lab animals to various amounts of the pesticide, Cress said.

Many scientists say testing pesticides' effects on lab animals is helpful in determining how pesticides will affect humans, he said. Others, however, say such testing is somewhat misleading because there are many organisms and chemicals that affect humans much differently than they do other animals, he said.

It is true many pesticides' effects vary considerably among organisms,

"What poisons one (organism) may be dessert to another," he said.

But despite researchers' debate about specific levels of pesticide toxicity, the fact remains that pesticides are dangerous if used incorrectly, Cress said.

"If used properly, any registered pesticide can be used safely," he said. According to a pesticide-user training manual published by the University's Cooperative Extension Service, using pesticides safely involves being able to recognize symptoms of poisoning commonly caused by excessive exposure to chemical pest controls.

Symptoms vary somewhat depending on which type of chemical pest control is used, according to the Excessive exposure to some insecticides, for example, may cause one or more of various symptoms.

Fatigue, headache, dizziness, blurred vision, nausea and vomiting are symptoms of mild poisoning. Weakness, chest discomfort and muscle twitches are symptoms of moderate poisoning. Unconsciousness, nose and mouth secretions, and breathing difficulty are symptoms of severe poisoning. Excessive exposure to some herbicides may cause one or more of these symptoms: redness, burning or blistering of the skin, headache, nausea, restlessness, irregular breathing and heartbeat, sweating or coma.

Knowing the symptoms of pesticide poisoning may be useful to those who think they have been exposed to pesticides, Cress said.

But even knowing the symptoms may not help those poisoned by unknowingly drinking pesticidecontaminated groundwater, he said.

This is because a considerable amount of time usually elapses before these individuals learn they have come in contact with a chemical pest control, Cress said.

Radical PETA fights against research

Group works to prevent cruelty to animals

By Bryan Ackley Science Reporter

For a growing number of environmental activists, saving the Earth means radically changing the way humans treat animals.

People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, a Washington, D.C.,-based animal rights activist group, may have a dramatic effect on changing the way the public views the use of animals during the

Boasting an annual budget of $7 million, 80 full-time, paid staff and more than 290,000 members, PETA has, since 1980, become the nation's largest animal rights

PETA is not shy in its efforts to end animal abuse at all levels, particularly that which occurs in biomedical research and the fur and cosmetics industries, said Siriol Evans, the organization's media relations coordinator. Although the group's ethics and the practicality of its methods are widely debated, PETA appears to have successfully initiated, at least to some degree, a decline in the use of animals in research and other areas of American society.

"We try to accomplish this through education, investigations, ■ See ANIMALS, Page 11 Animal activists receive criticism from scientific community

By Bryan Ackley Science Reporter

Some of the nation's leading scientists say some animal rights groups have created a climate of fear in the biomedical research community - a climate that could halt medical progress in the United States.

People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, based in Washington D.C., is the nation's largest animal rights activist group, and has drawn sharp criticism from the media and the scientific community.

PETA, which seeks the unconditional elimination of animal exploitation at all levels, considers the nation's biomedical research sector one of the largest, if not the largest, exploiters of animals, said Siriol Evans, PETA's media relations coordinator.

Most of the criticism that has been directed at PETA, she said, is the result of rumors that it has been involved, at least to some degree, with the Animal Liberation Front. ALF has become known in recent years for its illegal and often destructive research laboratory raids.

"There have been instances when ALF has (illegally) gotten into research labs and released animals or destroyed equipment, Evans said.

It is important for people to understand, she said, that PETA is not affiliated with ALF.

In February, however, the Washingtonian magazine published an article by journalist Katie McCabe, who discovered that PETA

Grenade kills schoolchildren

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) - A rifle-fired grenade slammed into a schoolbus and exploded during Christian factional fighting Wednesday, killing 11 schoolchildren and at least four other people.

"The driver was burning as the bus hit the sidewalk,"

"Many of the pupils yelled for help as we tried to extinguish the fire. At least one teacher also was among the dead along with the driver," said a soldier at the scene.

A police spokesman said the bus was hit while crossing into Christian east Beirut in the afternoon. It was bringing children back from school in south Beirut. The grenade ignited the fuel

"It couldn't be determined who fired the rifle grenade," said the spokesman, who cannot be named in line with regulations.

U.S.S.R. cuts oil supply

MOSCOW (AP) - The Soviet Union shut off oil supplies to Lithuania's only refinery Wednesday as Moscow began to impose Mikhail S. Gorbachev's threatened economic embargo on the breakaway Baltic republic, Lithuanian officials said.

Lithuanian President Vytautas Landsbergis said the move represented "economic coercion and economic warfare against a "Truly, this is recognition of the independence of Lithuania," he said. "It is hard to imagine why the people of Lithuania ... are being punished. What was their crime? Lithuanian Premier Kazimiera Prunskiene went to Olso, Norway, on a three-day mission seeking alternative oil supplies. In Washington, Secretary of State James A. Baker III said action by Moscow against Lithuania could doom commercial relations between the Soviet Union and the United States.

He said, "It's very difficult to see some of the commercial aspects of our relationship surviving the use of force or coercion" against Lithuania.

President Bush's spokesman, Marlin Fitzwater, said "we are looking into" reports of the oil cutoff.

He also said Bush received a private letter from Landsbergis "The president has not seen it yet but he will. We won't comment on the content."

Nation

Court expands judges' power

WASHINGTON (AP) - Federal judges may order local officials to raise property taxes to pay for the racial desegregation of public schools, the Supreme Court said Wednesday.

Although ruling unanimously in a Kansas City, Mo. case that judges themselves generally may not impose such tax increases, the court voted 5-4 empowering judges to tell school officials

The justices said such orders even take precedence over state laws imposing limits on school property taxes.

Civil rights forces praised the decision. "It's a powerful reaffirmation that state laws may not impede the vindication of constitutional rights, the rights of schoolchildren," said Paul

Holtzman of the Washington-based Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. Through the last three decades, the court has given federal judges sweeping power to take whatever steps necessary to end public school segregation — including forced busing of students, teacher reassignments, and even the partial merger of separate school districts.

Trade deficit declines

WASHINGTON (AP) - The United States in February recorded its smallest trade deficit in more than six years, a $6.49 billion imbalance that reflected a sharp drop in oil imports, the government reported Wednesday.

The Bush administration, which is counting on strong export growth this year to boost a sluggish domestic economy, hailed the dramatic narrowing of the deficit.

But some private economists cautioned that the improvement could be short-lived.

The Commerce Department said February's trade gap was down 30 percent from a $9.32 billion January deficit. It was the best trade showing since December 1983, when the deficit was $5.68 billion.

Imports fell by 7.6 percent, to $38.12 billion, while U.S. exports totaled $31.63 billion, a modest 1 percent decline from an all-time high for exports set in January.

Michael Boskin, President Bush's chief economic adviser, called the trade figure "very good news indeed" while cautioning that "we can't tell yet the extent to which it is a temporary or permanent phenomenon."

Some private economists remained pessimistic, contending that February's good showing came primarily from a huge 20 percent drop in oil imports that's not likely to be sustained.

With U.S. domestic oil production at 25-year lows, many economists look for America's dependence on foreign oil to continue rising, thus holding back improvements in the trade

Pornography may be illegal

WASHINGTON (AP) - States may make it a crime to possess or look at child pornography, even in one's home, the Supreme Court said Wednesday, as it imposed new limits on freedom of expression and privacy.

Voting 6-3, the justices upheld an Ohio law aimed at stamping out such material by punishing those who buy it, not only those who sell it.

Conservatives cheered the decision, saying it gives states a blueprint for tough legislation.

Beverly LaHaye of Concerned Women for America said every state should "take advantage of this decision and immediately begin to crack down on this depraved and contemptible exploitation of children."

But Justice William J. Brennan, in an opinion dissenting from the court ruling, said the law is so vague and so sweeping that it might ban the engravings of nude children "that adorn our

In a separate issue involving children, several justices voiced concern Wednesday that society's desire to protect children could deny fair trials to people charged with child abuse.

Wichita State fire ruled arson

WICHITA (AP) - Investigators determined arson was the cause of a Wednesday morning fire at an apartment complex adjacent to the Wichita State University campus.

Fire officials wouldn't say how or where the fire was started. Twenty-eight people were evacuated from the complex. Four were treated at the scene for smoke inhalation or minor injuries. Nobody was hospitalized.

The fire in the U-shaped three-story complex was discovered about 2 a.m. It took slightly more than an hour to extinguish. Some residents were allowed back into their apartments about 5

PUBLIC HEARING

The Council on Traffic, Parking and Police Operations has scheduled a public hearing for Friday, April 20, at 3 p.m. in the Big 8 Room of the K-State Union. The proposed changes in the parking rules and regulations for FY91 are summarized below:

- a) Fees for reserved stalls are increased to reflect the demand for reserved stalls and the limited number of available stalls. A 10-hour stall will cost $175 plus permit cost and a 24-hour stall will cost $265 plus permit cost.
- b) Requests for refunds of $10 or less for unused permit fees will not be honored.
- Visitor fees for drive-in visitors will be deleted.
- Other changes made were for clarity or better definition.

Senate to study funding

By Angela Tholstrup Collegian Reporter

Student Senate will consider final approval of student activity fee allocations and special allocations for Earthweek will be considered at 7 p.m. today in the K-State Union Big Eight Room.

The allocations, which had been voted on individually during the past three weeks, will be considered as a whole. The total of the tentative allocations to be voted on is $153,458.

With projected enrollment figures, Senate believes it will have $148,658. The difference will come out of an account with monies that weren't allotted in prior years, said Chris Kern, Student Senate Chairman.

There may be some amendments, but there weren't any formal appeals turned in by the deadline on Monday, Kern

Any group can be brought up for reconsideration of its tentatively approved budget, said John Woodbury, senator in agriculture.

Students Acting to Save a Vulnerable Environment is requesting a special allocation of $143 for Earthweek. The funds will be used to promote the lecture series and events for Earthweek.

A revision of the Constitution by-laws was submitted by the Senate Operations Committee, and will allow the committee to make grammatical corrections to proposed legislation.

It also allows the committee to make minor changes in phrasing to clarify its intent, but no other changes may be made without the sponsor's

Four candidates will be proposed for voting delegate positions on the Associated Students of Kansas Policy Council. The candidates are Todd Heitschmidt, Sean Cash, Jake Reisinger and Tricia Thornton.

Tuition hike supported by Regent report

By Gregory A. Branson Collegian Reporter

A report recommending a tuition increase of $218 for out-of-state students but only $18 for Kansas residents will be presented to the Board of Regents today at its regular monthly meeting.

The Special Committee on Tuition and Fees recommends a 10 percent increase for out-of-state students in order to bring Kansas non-resident tuition rates closer to those of peer institutions, the committee's report

The report said even with the increase, out-of-state tuition in Kansas is still 20 to 30 percent less than the national average.

Concern among students and parents that tuition costs have increased too rapidly in recent years is cited as the reason for the small rise for resident students, the report said.

The committee estimates the increase in tuition will generate an additional $6.3 million in tuition revenue at the six major regents schools in fiscal year 1992. K-State's share will be about $1.4 million, said John Struve, director of the University's budget office.

He said even though there is an increase in tuition, there will be no increase in K-State's budget.

"If history is an indicator, the increase will do absolutly nothing for the budget," Struve said. "As tuition increases, money we get from the general fund will go down."

A proposal that will require teachers seeking certification to have a Kansas college of education recommend them is also being presented to the board.

Currently, teachers needing to be re-certified, out-of-state teachers wanting to receive Kansas certification and certified teachers wanting to be certified in a different field must be recommended by a Kansas

Ticket distribution discussed in forum

By Jan Puls Collegian Reporter

Off-campus students often feel disadvantaged when camping out for season basketball tickets, members of the Athletic Ticket Sales Committee were told during a student forum Wednesday.

The forum in the K-State Union Courtyard provided an opportunity for the committee to get new ideas for ticket distribution and to determine whether the camp-out is adequate, said David McIntyre, committee member and panelist.

Other panelists included past and present members of the committee. In previous years, students haved pitched tents on the east side of Aheam Field House to reserve a place in line to buy tickets. About five students voiced opinions to the committee, and several supported a lottery-type system — in

"I think the system now puts offcampus residents at a disadvantage,' said Sarah Cunningham, senior in English education. "They need to find a system that is more fair, possibly a lottery where no one has an advantage.'

Keith A. Miller, senior in English education, said he supports a rotating lottery system, in which ticket holders would be grouped into sections that would rotate to different areas in Bramlage Coliseum during the

"The camp-out is bogus," Miller said. "It's a lot of time and trouble." McIntyre said he has done research at other universities where the lottery system is used, and the students have said they hate it. "The lottery is all right if you aren't for the students," McIntyre said. "I, myself, think the system

Independence doesn't fulfill promise

Remember when the days were long And rolled beneath a deep blue sky Didn't have a care in the world With mommy and daddy standin' by But "happily ever after" fails And we've been poisoned by these fairy tales

- Don Henley "The End of the Innocence"

m I the only person in the world who ever got what he wanted -and then wasn't sure he wanted it anymore? Seems to me that I've heard that somewhere before, but I never quite believed

I'm going to tell a story that I'm sure you're going to recognize, about a young and probably stupid high school student who was always beating her head against walls, denanding her rights and her independence. "I'm sixteen years old!" this foolish girl shouted, "I'm old enough to do what I want!" And so she rebelled and was stubborn and bouldn't wait to get out of the house and lead er own life.

Obviously, that was me. I "got out" some hree years ago, and have, presumably, been eading my own merry life and doing exactly what I want to do ever since. If you'd asked ne even just one year ago, I'd have told you that was the "happily ever after" I was looking for. But throughout all that time, that house I got out of with such joy has always been there for me to go back to, surrounded by familiar scenes and the people I grew up

So that was then and this is now, and things have changed. My parents picked up and moved and left me stranded at college with no refuge to return to except an apartment in a state that I've visited once. Not exactly a safe haven. That leaves me here trying to come up with a place for myself, and facing the fact that I'll never really go home again, which I wasn't really expecting to deal with quite so

I can remember when nearly every important decision was made for me and I resented it. Now I'm making those decisions for myself - where to live, how to live, whether to stay in school, what classes, what major, what graduate school — and all of a sudden I almost wish somebody would just tell me what to do so I could do it and get on with it. I tell all my friends I'm either going to business or law school, and I'm waiting for lightening to strike me or a message from God to tell me which one. They think I'm kidding. I'm not

I've read article after article about parents

their grown children like real children when they go home. Aren't we all guilty of acting like children when we go home, maybe even wanting to be children? Ask yourself: does your room still look like it did when you were in high school? Are there relics of homecoming and prom, old trophies and yearbooks everywhere you look? How old are the stuffed animals on the bed? I've been guilty of all that, and seeing it all disappear has hurt me more than I would have imagined. But it would be impossible and impractical to recreate that same shrine to my childhood in another place. It's time to move on, and I'm not ready.

More and more I find myself actually looking for my parents' approval and planning to lead the same life they've led. I used to date who won't let their kids grow up, who treat people that they disapproved of, but now I find myself dissapproving of the same people that they do. The idea of growing up and away and creating my own life and home scares the - um ... I can't say that, can I? Well, anyway, it scares me. I've actually figured out that my parents are pretty cool and they are often right when they give me advice, which doesn't mean I've learned to fol-

And since I like them now, they can really make me feel guilty about deciding, as is sometimes necessary, not to spend time with them. They're my friends, and I'm afraid to hurt them by telling them I'm trying to lead my own life. My dad always says that just when I turned into a real person he could talk s far as I'm concerned, the scariest idea of all is the idea of getting mara real step towards my own life - and starting my own family. A lot of my friends have been deciding to do that lately, and the peer pressure sometimes feels pretty strong. I can't imagine trying to create my own version of the institution my parents have lived in so well, just yet. When and if I decide to do something like that, I somehow picture somebody coming down from somewhere and saying, "No! Sorry, you're not old enough, wise enough or prepared enough to do as good a job as your parents did. Go back to the beginning and start again." It almost seems like my parents would consider it a sign of me telling them that I don't need them anymore, that now I can fill their roles for myself as well as others. I don't think I'll ever reach that point.

The real problem seems to be making the transition. When do we, or do we ever, reach the same plane? Will I ever be ready to make a decision they don't like and stick to it? And if I do, what if I'm wrong? I don't think I'm ready for all this responsibility yet, and what I'm wondering is: is anybody?

Here we all are, deciding to major in one thing and getting a job in another and making mistakes right and left. I'm not sure I like it. I don't feel quite old enough to guide my own life, but I do feel ready to take control of some of it. I can pretty much handle feeding myself -but then, I don't have to find the job to earn the money to do that yet. But a part of me always seems to be waiting for my parents to tell me that I'm wrong, I'm a failure, or worse yet, a disappointment.

So now what? I can analyze until I'm blue in the face and I still don't know where I'm going. If only somebody would tell me just what exactly is expected of me - then I'd be set. I think life should come with instructions.

Retiring faculty, staff commended for efforts

staff members were honored at the Faculty Senate Retirement Tea. In March, 26 retiring classified employees were honored at a recognition ceremony.

In most cases, the retirees received certificates, pins or pens. More important, they received recognition from the University community for a job well done.

Colleges tend to focus on students, people who haven't even gone unnoticed.

Tuesday, 42 retiring faculty and started their careers. But the faculty and staff members who put their expertise and efforts into the University are just as important as the students who take what they learn here out into the world. In this light, the retirement and recognition ceremonies are just as important as commencement.

Supreme Court ruling to aid desegregation decision will allow the federal judicial system to speed up the implementation of racial desegregation of public schools when local officials don't act quickly enough.

The court ruled 5-4 that judges may order school officials to raise property taxes to pay for school desegregation.

The ruling resulted from a Kansas City, Mo., case. In 1977, black parents sued the Kansas City, Mo., school district on the basis that the city had allowed the schools, with a predominately black student population, to decay. The parents claimed that their children's right to equal education was being denied.

In 1987, U.S. District Judge Russell G. Clark ordered the school

Wednesday's Supreme Court district to implement a desegregation program based on the magnet school system and to upgrade the physical facilities to ensure quality education. Clark also ordered city officials to double local property taxes to pay for the plan.

> The court's decision applies only to schools, however. In the dissenting opinion, Justice Anthony Kennedy expressed concern about the decision being used as a precedent for "the unelected, life-tenured judiciary" to impose taxes regardless of public approval.

In regard to school desegregation, however, the decision is a victory. School districts can no longer use the excuse of expense to drag their feet on desegregation. The Supreme Court went a long way in ensuring that equal educational opportunity remains a priority.

forget it, guys... GORBACHEU WANTS US TO CALL OFF THIS INDEPENDENCE THING

Tomatoes pose threat

"I've never heard of a killer tomato, and I don't think we've got a killer tomato plant here either." Alvin L. Young, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Los Angeles Times, April 14, 1990.

ah, sure. Right buddy. Just the kind of line they gave Steve McQueen in "The Blob." Those sheep-headed scientists and government muckamucks. Don't they know about meteorites, cosmic rays and ... mutations? Just as the great nescient mass of humanity predicted in "The Thing," and in "Invasion Of The Body Snatchers," — in practically all of the science fiction movies ever made - those meddlingwith-mother-nature scientists have finally caused the unthinkable.

But I know what the tomatoes are up to. Yes indeed.

From somewhere in the deep, dark, galactic viscera of the cosmos, a pernicious plot formed in their flagitious, fruity minds. These spherical fiends knew what they were about, oh yes!

It's the seeds. Shhh! Not so loud! They will hear. These mutant, interstellar, killer tomatoes are everywhere. Waiting. Waiting for ... the

I ... I'm sorry, but I must pause for a moment to ... to collect myself. You see, ever since I heard the news that a NASA contractor had warned that radiation-caused mutations in the 12.5 million tomato seeds the Space Shuttle Challenger left in space six years ago could cause the plants to produce mutant fruit, well ... the diabolical scheme thickened in my mind like so much Heinz Ketchup. Of my own volition, I have not ingested a single tomato or tomato product for for two ... long ... days. Yes, quite incredible when you think about it. The cost has been quite high, though. I have been experiencing severe gastronomic seizures — Pizza Hut withdrawals — Prego palsy - BLT decrepitude.

Why? Why haven't I eaten any tomatoes? Because ... they're here!

The Space Shuttle Columbia brought the seeds back from "outer space" in January. NASA officials have since distributed more than 120,000 kits of tomato seeds to teachers across the country for experimental growing in school science projects.

But, that's their plan, don't you see? The seeds were exposed to cosmic radiation. These now "fertile" seeds will be grown, and the mutant tomatoes will be eaten, causing the young human host to become ... one of ...

Then the little mutant tomato slaves will take the transubstantiated tomatoes home to their unsuspecting mothers and fathers. Before long, the entire planet will be one vast, mutant vegetable garden, er ... I mean fruit eedless to say, due to my abstemious dietary disregard for the flavorful fruit, my guts have been wracked these last two days by a ghastly grippe. The insidious tomato has permeated every level of culinary delectation. The mutant killers introduced the "infertile" seeds into South America about five hundred years ago. You know those ancient air-strips in Peru that look like ancient air-strips? Well, that's where their tomato-laden shuttle-crafts landed and dropped their payload of the alien, adulterated lycopersicon esculentum.

Then, the locals got hold of them. And the first Incan politician to get nailed in the puss with one ... well, there you have it. The first human thrall to the nebulous power of the tomato. It wasn't long before we were all hooked. We now use them in everything from soup to gory Hollywood movies.

The vanguard to this invasion came years ago. I am sure you have seen them. They go to the Pizza Hut buffet every day.

They are the bulbous ones. The ones with the round tomato bodies and round, red, tomato faces — plates piled high with 50 bazillion pieces of thick, hot, tomatoey pizza. Go there. You'll see.

But be careful. Don't give in. You must resist them. Resist the interstellar, mutant, killer tomatoes ... before its too late.

"Chops and Tomato sauce. Yours,

Citizens express jail site concerns

By Laura Scroggins Collegian Reporter

Representatives of Seven Dolors School were present at the Manhattan USD 383 school board meeting Wednesday to voice their opinions about the proposed jail expansion on the current site.

"Jails should not be placed near any schools," said Janice Farinelli, member of Jail - Citizens Organized for Responsible Placement.

Mike Kearns, member of the organization who has three children in the school, said he is concerned about the proposed jail expansion.

An outline of concerns was read to the members of the school board by Kearns.

Kearns said that the jail would bring a negative atmosphere to the neighborhood.

"Jails and schools are not compatible," he said. Kearns also expressed the concern that expanding on the existing site would cost more in the long run than relocating to an expandable site

This, he said, was because another expansion has been tentatively planned for the year 2005. Such an expansion would use up the remaining land owned by the county and force it to buy the existing property from the residents in order to expand outward. This, said Kearns, would further harm the atmosphere of the neighborhood.

Kearns also said a school and a jail represent two opposites.

A school represents the hope of a future and the possibility of dreams. Jails, he said, represent lost dreams.

The jail site has been the subject of controversy during the past month, and has set concerned parents against county commissioners who claim the best option is building on the current site across from the church and

The county could save as much as $1 million if the facility is built on the current site, according to the county engineer. Money would be saved because the jail and police station buildings are used in the plan and the site would not have to be improved before construction could begin.

The plan calls for a combination police station and jail that would oc-

By Scott Paske Sports Reporter

Like many individuals who exceed the 300-pound barrier, junior noseguard Evan Simpson was nicknamed after a home appliance.

"Coming out of high school, I was called 'The Oven,'" Simpson said. "It's kind of carried over, but I'm trying to get rid of it."

With or without a nickname, it is difficult to ignore the presence of the 5-foot-11, 315-pound Simpson. After sitting out a year as a transfer from the University of Iowa, the broad-shouldered Omaha, Neb., native is gearing to make opposing offensive linemen take notice durthe 1990 sea

"It's was tough having to miss last season, but I think I've learned something from that," Simpson said. "I'll be a little bit more excited in the fall, but right now, in spring ball, I'm getting the necessary (repetitions)."

Simpson was the lone player to come from the Hawkeye program with Wildcat head coach Bill Snyder when Snyder took the K-State job in 1988. He said the reasons were a combination of a personal conflict and loyalty to a man Heating up the

"I didn't really get along with my position coach at Iowa, and there was really no reason for me to stay up there," Simpson said. "Coach Snyder recruited me out of high school, and everything he said he could offer to me, he delivered. When Coach got the opportunity to come down here, it was like seeing a new life."

Simpson's addition will bring size and power to a defensive unit decimated by a lack of depth and injuries a year ago. Unlike most people his size, it is hard to find an area who gave him his first chance out of on Simpson's body not dominated by muscle and bulk.

'That's just something that ties in with football," Simpson said. "I started working in the weight room my sophomore year in high school, and I've loved it ever since."

As a prepster, Simpson captured a pair of Nebraska state powerlifting championships. His bench press has increased from 290 pounds in his first state competition to 550 pounds today.

The 'Cats will be looking for Simpson to provide depth at the noseguard position, and challenge sophomore Ekwensi Griffith for a K-State finished fifth in the Big Eight Conference in team defense last season, it's best performance since 1970. For the second time in nine years, the 'Cats led the nation in pass defense, but yielded 300 yards per game on the ground.

"I think we can improve on the defensive line, but since the numbers are so low, we'll have to work hard," Simpson said. "We've got six or seven players that can go, but that's not many over the course of a long season,' Simpson said the K-State coaches have made his transition between programs easier.

"Right now, the coaches are the biggest part of the team, because they're willing to take out extra time to help newcomers like me," he said. "With K-State's past being the way it is, (the coaches) realize you can't just come in and win eight or nine games without trying.

"They're building a foundation right now that will prove really nice as early as the fall."

And count on The Oven to be part of that success.

K.C. clips Tribe with 7-0 shutout

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Willie Wilson, considered washed up a year ago by many long-time Kansas City watchers, is running and hitting as if the clock had been turned back to

"Willie looks like a man on a mission right now," Manager John Wathan said Wednesday night after Wilson went 3-for-3 and scored three runs in the Royals' 7-0 victory over Cleveland. "He could stay in the lineup every day all season."

A 13-year veteran who spent most of his career batting leadoff, Wilson went to spring training knowing he was competing only for a backup role. But when right fielder Danny Tartabull went out with a leg injury two games into the season, Wilson returned to center field.

"He's swinging the bat as good as I've ever seen him," Wathan said. "I didn't feel I had anything to prove," said Wilson, 34. "I just wanted to go out there and play well to help the team. If I go out there with that kind of attitude, I'm just going to put undue pressure on myself."

Wilson isn't even eager to go back to his familiar leadoff role. He's been hitting seventh.

"I kind of like it down there in that No. 7 hole," he said. "It's fun down Storm Davis, Jeff Montgomery and Steve Farr combined on a sevenhit shutout of the Indians.

"That's two nights in a row now we haven't done anything offensively," said Cleveland Manager John McNamara. "In fact tonight we really didn't have much of a threat all night."

Davis, a free agent signed in the off-season, got his first victory for Kansas City. He gave up five hits in seven innings.

Tom Brookens, the second batter of the game, singled and eventually reached third, but Davis (1-1) did not allow another runner past first. Davis, 9-2 lifetime against the Indians, struck out five and walked one.

Bob Boone, the 42-year-old catcher, drove in three runs with a suicide-squeeze bunt and a bloop

Oakland tells Raiders go back to Los Angeles

By The Associated Press

OAKLAND, Calif. - The Oakland City Council, bowing to angry constituents, has backed away from the $428 million deal to bring the Raiders back to their original home. But it also called for new talks with owner Al Davis.

The 6-0 vote came Tuesday night under the threat of a local referendum to spike the plan. Nearly 32,000 signatures have been collected, aimed at getting the question on a ballot this

The Raiders weren't on the council's official agenda Tuesday night, so another vote will have to be taken, as required by state law.

Observers said the latest vote meant "going back to square one" in talks with the NFL team, but a leading backer of the plan was not hopeful.

"The deal has been killed," Alameda County Board of Supervisors Chairman Don Perata said after the council vote. "The council, by its agreement. We no longer have a peared on the ballot.

Although the council also called for new talks with the team, it was unknown whether the Raiders still were willing to negotiate. Davis did not return telephone calls for comment Tuesday night, and Al LoCasale, the Raiders' executive assistant, said Wednesday the team would not comment on the council's vote.

Five weeks ago, the council approved a $602 million incentive package to get the team back. Davis said he looked forward to signing an

Twyner player of week

K-State centerfielder L.J. Twyner has been named as the Big Eight's baseball player of the week for his efforts in K-State's series against Missouri, Twyner finished the week 9-of-15 at the plate, including seven runs scored, four runs batted in and his first home run of the season. He led K-State to a 5-1 week and has helped the Wildcats to 14 wins in their last 17 games.

Twyner is a junior from Davenport, Iowa. He transferred to K-State from Western Oklahoma State Junior College.

Wyoming, K-State settle

K-State will pay Wyoming an unspecified amount of money for dropping two future football games between the two schools, says Athletic Director Steve Miller.

"This was resolved exactly the way I thought it would be. We just bought out of it," Miller said Tuesday.

The canceled games were scheduled Sept. 15 this year in Laramie, Wyo., and Sept. 14, 1991, in Manhattan. Contracts for the two games were signed in 1984, but Miller notified Wyoming officials of K-State's plan to play New Mexico State in Manhattan on Sept. 15. Wyoming responded by filing a suit last month in Albany County, Wyo., District Court. The suit claimed breach of contract and asked for punitive damages.

Jeff Schemmel, assistant athletic director at K-State, helped negotiate the settlement and said both sides had agreed not to disclose the settlement sum.

Wyoming filled the open spot on its schedule for this fall with a home game against Arkansas State, which is coached by former Wyoming coach Al Kincaid.

Reds still rolling

CINCINNATI - The Cincinnati Reds equaled the best start in club history Wednesday night, improving to 8-0 as Mariano Duncan, Paul O'Neill and Chris Sabo homered in an 11-7 victory over the San Diego Padres.

Duncan's two-run homer tied the game 5-5 in the third inning and O'Neill put the Reds ahead to stay with a three-run homer in the fourth. O'Neill, who entered the game as a pinch hitter in the third inning, had four of the Reds' 14 hits.

The eight wins matched the 1980 team's start and gave the Reds their longest winning streak since they won eight in a row in September 1988. The 1982 Atlanta Braves hold the National League record of 13 straight wins to start a season.

Cincinnati's Tim Layana (2-0) pitched two innings in relief for the victory and San Diego's Rafael Valdez (0-1) gave up both Cincinnati homers in his first major-league appearance.

KU Relays begin with multi-events

By Dan Wicker Sports Reporter

It is getting down to crunch time for the K-State track and field team as it travels to Lawrence Friday and Saturday for the Kansas Relays. The multi-event performers got a jump on the rest of the field with the decathlon and heptathlon beginning

Wednesday. K-State's Terry VanLaningham and Karen McGaughey are sitting in third place of the men's decathlon and women's heptathlon, respectively, after the first day of the multi-events. The Wildcats' other entry, Steve Yoder, is in seventh place in the decathlon. The competitions will finish today at Memorial Stadium.

McGaughey's total of 2,870 points was her best-ever, first-day performance, and she trails leader Busarid Rogers of Pittsburg State by just 136 points.

"She did a great job today," K-State assistant coach Cliff Rovelto said. "If she has a solid day (today), then she has a chance of getting the school record (4,832 points). She won't have to do anything spectacular, just what she has been doing." VanLaningham piled up 3,549 points while setting a personal record ter job of getting better teams there. I in the long jump with a leap of don't think we get a lot of support 22-101/2 . He trails leader Morris Ellis of Eastern Michigan by just under 200 points.

"After the first three events, he had his highest total," Rovelto said. "Overall, his score isn't too bad for a first-day total."

Yoder, competing in his first de-cathlon ever, had 3,338 points. "He had a couple of events he did pretty well in," Rovelto said. "He's not doing too bad for his first time." Friday, K-State will take nearly its entire team and has filled entries in most every event in a meet that Coach John Capriotti said is one of the most crucial of the season.

"We are taking all of our people, running a lot of people in their events and a couple of relays," Capriotti said. "The Kansas Relays, outside of the conference and national meet, is probably our biggest meet of the year. It is in the home state and we have always done well there."

The relays have been on an upswing in the past few years according to Capriotti. He said there will be thirty collegiate teams represented along with junior colleges and the high school athletes.

"The coaches now are doing a bet-from our conference, us and Missouri are the only ones that go there, but they are getting more numbers in there," Capriotti said. "I think the meet has come up the last couple of years. I would like to see it be a better meet because it would help us."

On the women's side, Angie Miller will be looking to continue her dominance in the shot put and discus where she will be a heavy favorite to bring home two gold medals. However, Capriotti said that she might be challenged from Missouri's top thrower, Cydne Ryan. "The girl from Missouri has thrown 48 or 49, but you never know what individuals will show up," Capriotti said. "I think she would be a heavy favorite in her two events, but she still has to go out and throw far."

On the men's side, Clifton Etheridge has turned in some promising performances since the beginning of the outdoor season. Capriotti is looking for Etheridge to really turn the corner in preparation for the conference meet, which is May 19-21 at Oklahoma City.

"He has been sprinting real well, and, now, he is going to open up in the long jump this week for the first time outdoors," Capriotti said. "I thought he opened real well at Nebraska last week in the triple jump."

Along with Etheridge, watch out for Tyrone Watkins and Marcus Wright in the 400 and 800 meters, respectively. Watkins is only a second away from qualifying for the NCAA meet, and Wright has met the provisional qualifying mark.

Capriotti prides himself in having very competitive relay teams. At the Texas Relays the team turned in some impressive times which should help the Wildcats in preparation for the competition at Lawrence.

"Because the Texas Relays is a very good meet, we are much better prepared by going to that meet," Ca-priotti said. "If not this would really be our first relay meet."

The Kansas Relays is also a huge recruiting venue for high school seniors and one that Capriotti would not pull his athletes out of for anything because of their pure enjoyment for the meet.

"That is why we go to this meet every year because it is a great recruitment tool and plus it has the K-State-Kansas rivalry," Capriotti said. "The kids have fun running there. We could have gone to California or back east, but there is no way the kids will want to miss this meet."

Norris' relief effort shows signs of season

By The Associated Press

ANAHEIM, Calif. - Not bad, Mike Norris, for your second major league game in almost seven years a perfectly pitched inning and a victory over California.

"I couldn't have come up with a better scenario," he said after Oakland beat the Angels 7-5 Tuesday night in 12 innings. It was his first big-league win since May 16, 1983, and only his second major league appearance since Aug. 6 of that year. a bad right shoulder. "I was basically just trying to get the first strike over with something on the ball," he said. "It hasn't sunk in yet. Another part of the new Mike Norris is that I'm better able to handle the highs and lows."

The highs came 10 years ago when, at age 25, Norris was one of the best - a 22-game winner.

The lows came when Norris developed a substance abuse problem and

In 1980, Norris was 22-9 with a staggering 24 complete games, 284 innings pitched, a 2.53 earned run average and 180 strikeouts. In nine of his complete games, he allowed four hits or fewer. He was second in the AL in victories, ERA, strikeouts, complete games and innings pitched. That was the year that Billy Martin, then the A's manager, seemed to overwork his young, talented starting rotation. But Norris, who pitched almost 140 innings more than he did the previous year, doesn't believe Martin's tactics contributed to his subsequent shoulder problems. "Billy gave me a once-in-alifetime opportunity," Norris told the Los Angeles Times in a recent interview. "He believed in me when others didn't. I had a tremendous season, and if I had the chance to do it the same way again, I would."

"The Midwest is the toughest part of the country to debate," said Ed Schiappa, associate professor and director of debate.

"UCLA travels the Southwest, a weaker circuit," Schiappa said. They beat up on more people in the Southwest than we did in the Midwest."

Four K-State teams advanced to the elimination rounds in the tournament. The tournament had 240 teams from more than 90 schools. To advance to the elimination rounds, the teams had to place in the top 64.

Bill Boggs, senior in sociology, and Dan Molden, junior in speech, made it to the semifinals but lost to a team from Southwest Missouri State. Three members received top indi-Molden finished 16th.

Regents approve center for business leadership

By Sandy Hegarty

The Kansas Board of Regents recently approved the creation of the Kansas State University Center for Leadership in the College of Business Administration.

"Organizational leaders and managers often have adequate technical training, but lack the necessary skills to lead and motivate people," said Yar Ebadi, professor of management and head of the management department.

The center's faculty will conduct research and offer training and information on leadership and related areas in response to business and student needs.

'We have been working on this idea for a long time," Ebadi said. "We have checked with other departments on campus and also outide campus about this area."

The center will draw experts from the University's faculty in leadership development from ex-isting curriculums including management, industrial psychology, industrial engineering, small business and entrepreneurship, he said.

"It should be stressed that this is an interdisciplinary program," Ebadi said. "We have a large number of experts in our department and other departments."

Ebadi said the center will sponsor and fund theoretical and applied research in leadership and human relations in organizations. It will also offer seminars, workshops, a newsletter, classes and individual consultation.

Some possible topics include management training, conflict management, stress management, motivation, communication skills, and job design and redesign. "Its purpose is not just for the students, but also for helping the outside community," Ebadi said. "Anything that comes under the umbrella of leadership will be

Student paints New York mural on boarded-up Aggieville theater

By Laura Scroggins Collegian Reporter

An empty theater got a facelift Saturday, thanks to the efforts of Aggieville business people and a K-State student. "New York's the Big Apple; we're the Little Apple," said Pat Ball, owner and operator of Functions.

Ball was describing the mural of New York City that Angelique Jackson, junior in fine arts, painted during Easter weekend on the boarded-up front of the old Varsity Theater in Aggieville.

The mural depicts an area of New York City with a prominent theater in the foreground. In the mural, the theater's marquee name was changed to read "Varsity Theater" and one of the New York City street signs now says

Jackson said she was approached by Ball, whom she already knew from applying for a job at Functions, to come up with a design for the mural in late March. This was just after the Aggieville Merchants had met and approved the decorating of the plywood that has covered the theater since its closing three years ago.

Ball and Krystallos' owner Lin Martin split the cost of the project. The purpose of the mural was to improve the environment of the block, said Ball.

"We love it," she said.

Previously, a holiday salutation with Christmas trees adorned the theater. Ball said something less seasonal was desired, and Jackson's designs offered that.

Jackson was encouraged to sign the work and use it in her portfolio. 'That in itself was enough to commission the work for free," said Jackson, who did not ask to be paid. Ball refused to disclose the cost of the work, saying it could drive the price up in the future. She said, however, that she felt Jackson's work was worth more than she was paid.

Ball said she is planning to ask the ■ See MURAL, Page 14

Playwrights' Stage provides 9 students chance to see, hear works performed

By Todd Fertig

As several actors silently enter the dimly lit stage, a narrator seated on the edge of the stage introduces the setting for a play. Instead of physically portraying their roles, the actors simply read their lines from the scripts, occasionally gesturing but rarely moving from the half-circle they are seated in.
"Charles exits," the narrator says.

The character playing Charles doesn't exit the stage, but merely steps back from the half-circle and continues following the script silently.

A staged reading of a play - without sets, props and costumes and with minimal action - gives an audience only a vague idea of what the play will be like when performed. For the playwright, however, a staged reading brings to life the dialogue that had previously only existed in his or her mind.

Playwrights' Stage, staged readings of plays in the Purple Masque Theatre on Sunday nights, is giving nine K-State graduate students the opportunity to see and hear their works on stage.

"What you see on paper is just so different from what is acted out," said Stephanie Cox, graduate student in English, whose play "The Fig Tree" was read April 8. "Hearing your play read on stage, having each character portrayed with a voice and a face and getting to feel the audience's reaction helps you know much more about it than just reading

An audience affects the performance of a play through response, Cox said. The reading of her play has given Cox ideas for revision that she said she wouldn't have gotten

"I know now what really worked and what didn't, and now I know how to fix things to make it better," Cox said. "Before we started rehearsals I hadn't ever heard my play read, so now when I revise it, I'll see and hear the characters from the staged reading."

The whole purpose of Playwrights' Stage is not to entertain the audience, but for us to learn from the audience's response," said Katheryn Mattingly, graduate student in English and one of the writers most responsible for the organization of the staged readings.

"Once you've reached a point in the writing process, you need something to help you know what to improve," Mattingly said. "If the climax or the emotional parts of the play need work, the way it comes out on stage and the audience's reaction will tell you."

Following the reading of each play is a discussion period in which the audience, the actors and the playwrights share their perceptions of the play and how they feel it could be improved.

"Good plays are not written, they're rewritten," said Norman Fedder, professor of speech and professional playwright. "Playwrights are always falling by the wayside. By the time a play reaches this stage, the writer is already semi-professional because to do what is needed to make a play this good takes energy as well as ability.'

Fedder worked with several graduate students in a playwriting work-shop. Fedder and Carl Hinrichs, associate professor of speech and the instructor of Introduction to Playwriting and Advanced Playwriting, have helped in the development of these writers and in the formation of Playwrights' Stage.

Playwriting is a very restrictive, compact medium, Fedder said. It differs from other forms of writing in that it must be presented in dialogue with limits on time and changes of setting. Without narration to describe setting and help express emotion, everything must be implied or described in realistic conversation, he

"Each playwright is different, and there is no formula for a perfect play," Fedder said. "There are certain principles which are crucial to a play, but to relate those principles to someone isn't easy. We can teach students a lot about how the elements of a play must come together, but eventually it comes down to not just hearing it from a teacher, but seeing it on stage and seeing the reaction of the audience.'

The problem new playwrights find most difficult to overcome is establishing an element of conflict with which the audience can identify early in the play, then continuing that conflict throughout the play, Fedder

"As simple as that sounds, it is very difficult to keep that focus on the conflict and build upon it," he said. "Often it gets lost, or the audience gets sidetracked by other elements of the play. Drama is not the art of dialogue, it is the art of conflict.'

Becoming a good playwright involves a combination of insight and practice, Fedder said. The development of a playwright is a delicate process requiring several years of trial and failure.

"I'm more worried about the development of the playwright than the play," Fedder said.

Fedder calls Playwrights' Stage the most successful attempt at a staged readings workshop he's been involved with. He said the audiences, which usually consist of about 60 people, have been helpful to the writers. The audiences have been about the size the writers wanted for a workshop-type attmosphere.

Many of the actors who read the plays are non-theater majors. Each writer's play is directed by another graduate student playwright, allowing participants to gain experience in unfamiliar roles, Mattingly said. She admitted, however, that the writers hoped their plays appear relatively polished for the audiences.

"The first show was the scariest," Mattingly said. "We weren't sure how it was going to go, but they've all gone really well, and the audience's response has been that they can get a realistic feel for each play from the reading."

"If I didn't think the plays were good, I wouldn't want to bore an audience for two hours with them," Fedder said. "I'm proud of them. All of them demonstrate a great deal of ability on the parts of the writers."

Playwrights' Stage will present 'Over the Sun" by Adam Wiggs, graduate student in speech, at 7 p.m. April 22 in the Purple Masque Theatre. Three one-act plays, one written by Barbara Baker, graduate student in student counseling/ personal services; one written by Brock Griffin, graduate student in English; and one written by Don Poenisch, graduate student in English, will be presented at 7 p.m. April 29 in Nichols Theatre.

Seminar focuses upon software

By Todd Ubben Collegian Reporter

The patentability of computer software and proper methods of obtaining software protection were discussed at a seminar sponsored by the KSU Research Foundation Wednesday at the University Inn.

About 37 faculty and staff members attended the two-hour seminar. Bob Hovey and Steve Dickey, partners in the law firm of Hovey, Williams, Timmons, and Collins of Kansas City, Mo., addressed the audience and answered questions.

"Probably the two areas with the biggest backlog in patenting right now are biotechnology and software," said John Walters, president of the Foundation.

"There's a lot of software work that goes on at the University," he noted. "Our hope, of course, is that this might give a number of the researchers some ideas and that they might come up with some things they've been working on that they would file disclosures on, and then we would see whether it would be patentable or

The Foundation filed for a patent Feb. 1, 1989, on a software database designed by Bert Biles, associate dean of the Graduate School, Walters said.

Hovey gave an overview of the patent, trademark and copyright laws and discussed the process of applying for patents.

'If you have an idea, an invention, that is really an advance in the art, you will disclose that idea to the government, and they will in return for that disclosure, give you a limited monopoly," he said.

Hovey said the utility and plant patents expire in 17 years, while the design patents expire in 14. With a few exceptions, patents are not renewable, and after they expire, anyone can legally make the patented product.

Dickey talked about patentability in regard to computer programs, and he noted that software patentability did not come about until 1982.

Basically, the Supreme Court said computer programs are methods of operating the machine, and methods of operating the machine or processes have always been patentable," he said.

Copyrights only protect the expression in computer programs, but patents effectively protect the idea in them, he said.

Dickey said patents cannot be obtained on programs that merely solve mathematical formulas.

Requirements for the patentability of software, as with any invention, are that it be useful, novel, non-obvious, presents patentable subject matter and an original invention.

Condom Sense Week to focus on safe sex

By Lori Stauffer Collegian Reporter

The purpose of Condom Sense Week, April 23-26, is not to promote

The purpose is to encourage students to use a condom if they are having sex and educate them about the risks they take if one is not used, said Lynne Eakin, co-coordinator of the week and junior in elementary

"Students don't realize it, but six years down the road, they may be infected with AIDS," Eakin said.

A panel of people with AIDS will discuss their experiences with the disease at noon Monday in the Union Courtyard. Panel members in various stages of infection will talk about how they are dealing with the disease and how others react to them knowing they have AIDS, said Cindy Burke, health educator at Lafene Student Health Center.

Burke said the panel will give students a chance to talk to people who are infected but "look as normal as you and I."

She said it will be an interesting, educational experience for students to see a person who has the AIDS virus leading normal lives and looking healthy and then seeing the progression of the virus where healthy is "not the way they look anymore." Students will also have the opportunity to get involved with a quilt project similar to the national quilt project for AIDS patients, Eakin

The quilt, located at an information table in the Union, will start with the block that reads "Condom Sense

Sex is a part of human nature. (People) have feelings and are going to act on those feelings. They need to know what to do to prevent STDs, AIDS or an unwanted pregnancy. We can't prevent it completely, but we can at least slow it

-Cindy Burke, health educator Lafene Student Health Center

Week 1990 - KSU Concerned Students" to which students may add their signatures. A quilt block will be added each year.

Students will be able to express their views about condom dispensing machines in a survey available at the information table April 24, 25 and 26, Burke said.

At noon April 25, another panel will discuss condom machines on campus. Panel members will include representatives from student government, residence halls, faculty and a physician from Lafene.

Condoms are not just a form of birth control, Burke said. They offer a new form of protection. Quality latex condoms, used every single time and used correctly will protect against disease.

"The birth control pill does not provide protection against disease," she said. "A condom should be used every time for that protection."

Burke said the problem lies in the fact that most students believe nothing like AIDS, a sexually transmitted disease or unwanted pregnancy is ever going to happen to them.

National statistics report that 75 percent of college freshman are already sexually active and more than 90 percent of college graduates are sexually active, Burke said.

"Sex is a part of human nature," she said. "(People) have feelings and are going to act on those feelings. They need to know what to do to prevent STDs, AIDS or an unwanted pregnancy. We can't prevent it completely, but we can at least slow it

Embryo tests determine sex within days

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK - Scientists say they have identified the sex of 3-day-old embryos in the test tube and that two women implanted with tested embryos are expected to deliver twin girls this summer.

Further research might provide a way to screen out embryos that would develop serious genetic diseases, removing the prospect of abortions in those cases, researchers said.

The study was aimed at producing female babies in cases where a male could inherit a serious genetic disease, said researcher Alan Handyside.

While the technique also would allow choosing the sex of a child without any medical reason, Handyside said he would consider that unethical.

The new work is reported in today's issue of the British journal Nature by Handyside and colleagues at the Royal Postgraduate Medical School at Hammsmith Hospital in London.

Laboratory techniques have been used before to determine a baby's sex.

Artist portrays wildlife and western scenes through sculptures

By Rod Gillespie Collegian Reveiwer

The Veterinary Medicine Complex is no stranger to animals, but these might turn a few heads. The beasts — lunging and straining, jumping, running and kicking — are no ordinary creatures.

They're made of bronze.

The second floor breezeway of Trotter Hall will become an art gallery this week for a show featuring the work of western and wildlife artist T.D. Kelsey. The exhibition, sponsored by the Department of Art, the College of Veterinary Medicine and the K-State Friends of Art, is open to the public and runs from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Friday through Wednesday.

The show will feature from 16 to 20 pieces, depending on space in the breezeway.

His sculptures are known for their attention to detail and the powerful images of life and movement they

"I think movement is important in a sculpture, whether it be an action piece or just a bust of someone," Kelsey said. "I tend to like action more than I like stationary objects."

His bronzes depict wildlife and vivid western scenes, freezing moments in time and allowing the viewer to experience the feeling of each passionate scene. One can sense the blur of motion in each piece, feel the strain of each taut sinew, taste the dust kicked up by pawing hooves. Kelsey said he tries to capture the feeling of the scenes his sculptures depict.

in the exhibition is the aptly titled "The Introduction." At first glance, the viewer sees a cowboy, dressed in cold-weather gear, trying to mount his skittish horse. On closer inspection, one sees why the horse is nerv-

Not all of the works follow a western theme. Six of the wildlife pieces in the exhibition are influenced by Kelsey's recent trip to Africa and feature cape buffalo, kudus, zebras, lions and lionesses.

Kelsey is probably best known for his larger-than-life sculptures. Standing in the Fort Worth stockyards, "Texas Gold," is a 1981 tribute to the people who preserved the Texas Longhorn breed when it was nearing extinction. Seven running Longhorn steers, each carrying a brand from one of the seven families that sustained the cattle, jostle one another in a scene marked by Kelsey's action-filled style.

Another large sculpture, 1988's "The Briargate Mustangs," ornaments the entrance to Briargate Business College in Northern Colorado Springs, Colo. The piece depicts a group of wild horses on the run.

Born in 1946, Kelsey grew up near Bozeman, Mont., and developed a love for the western lifestyle at an early age. Initially, art was not his primary vocation. At 20, he was the youngest pilot ever employed by United Airlines. He also enjoyed stints as a rodeo bronco rider and a rancher before becoming a full-time artist.

Marketing team plans strategies for competition

By Anne Krauss Collegian Reporter

Financial projections, target markets and communications strategies are topics of discussion whenever members of the National Agri-Marketing Association meet to prepare for the na-tional NAMA Marketing Team Competition.

"It's a team of students involved in developing a total marketing plan for a product," said John Riley, assistant director of agriculture resident instruction and NAMA adviser. "They must define the product and its market, develop a marketing plan to sell it and analyze whether it meets its objectives and is financially feasible."

About 30 teams from colleges and universities compete each year, Riley said. Each team selects its own product, submits a written report and presents its plan orally at the national NAMA convention.

"We do what a lot of people learn about in class," said Roger Long, senior in agronomy. "We apply theories to a fictional product and present our plan on a national level."

Riley said the type of product can range from something sold directly to producers or agribusinesses to agriculturally based consumer products. The product may be real, but teams cannot use exising marketing plans.

This year's team has selected a device called MonTech that monitors grain elevator legs for malfunctions that could cause a grain dust explosion.

"It's been exciting because this is an actual product that currently has prototypes in working order," Long said. He said this type of product is also timely because the Occupational Safety and Health Administration will soon be tightening its regulations for grain elevators. Riley said each team is eva-

Vet Med research awaits funds

Kansas Racing Commission expected to select College's greyhound proposal

> By Todd Ubben Collegian Reporter

Greyhound research in the College of Veterinary Medicine began three years ago, but researchers within the college are still awaiting word from the Kansas Racing Commission on how they will select proposals for funding research.

Michael Lorenz, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said the college has written and asked the commission what procedures will be used for viewing the proposals.

A greyhound research group has been formed within the college, and information has been collected from other states on how they distribute proceeds for research.

Roger Fedde, professor of anatomy and physiology, and Nathan Gabbert, associate professor of surgery and medicine, are the members of the research group who have coordinated efforts on funding proposals.

One proposal for greyhound research submitted by Dr. Rob Gillette of the University of Kansas received the support of the racing commission, Lorenz said, but he noted that this was a case of individual initiative.

According to Harish Minocha, associate dean of research and graduate affairs, the biggest force in greyhound research at K-State came a year ago when greyhound kennels and a 200-yard sprint track were built on the complex.

The facilities were funded by two dog food companies, and about 30 to 40 dogs are kept in the kennels.

Universities in the state may benefit from the funding of the racing commission in the future, Minocha

"Part of the unclaimed ticket receipts are going to be used for doing greyhound research in the state of Kansas," he said.

'We're hoping that the proposals will be invited by an ordinary board that would have the technical ability to review these proposals, and then they'll decide where to put the money.'

Minocha said the college has the facilities to study such factors in greyhound racing as the nutritional qualities of food the dogs receive, contamination of that food, genetics of the dogs and vaccination processes.

"I think the College of Veterinary Medicine at Kansas State University has a lot to offer to the greyhound industry," he said.

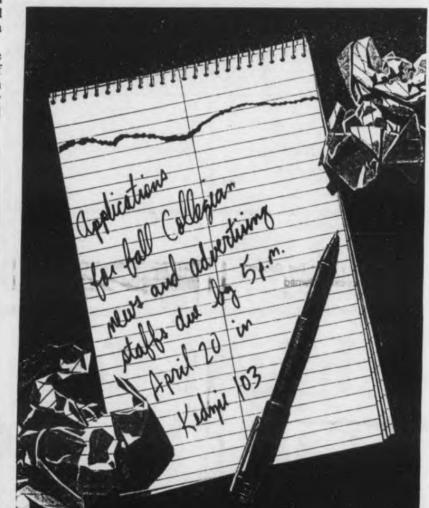

Currently, metabolic research funded by the two dog companies and the Kansas Technological Enterprise Corporation is being done on the greyhounds.

"We've just done some work looking at cramping in greyhounds and done some descriptive work on physiological changes in the blood that occur actually during the race," research associate Phil Toll said. An automated blood sampler, an electronic pack placed on the dog's back, is used to take blood samples at different time intervals so that meta-

Until the racing commission decides on its funding and proposal procedures, the only major sources of funding open to the University are the American Greyhound Council in Florida and the National Greyhound Association in Abilene, Minocha bolic changes can be analyzed.

Three research proposals have been turned in by the college, one of which, on bacterial contamination in meat fed to greyhounds, was recently accepted to be developed into a full proposal.

According to PETA's 1989 Annual Review, the course involved teaching how to investigate cases of animal abuse, organize public demonstrations and shop for "crueltyfree" products.

Cruelty-free products, Evans said, are products that have not been tested on animals or manufactured with animal-derived ingredients.

A 1989 PETA Cruelty-Free Shopping Guide lists 181 companies that sell animal-derived products in the United States. The guide also lists 54 companies that sell "cruelty-free" products in the United States.

Furthermore, PETA has enlisted a number of celebrities - singer Belinda Carlisle and actress Rue McClanahan, among others — to speak or perform in behalf of its

PETA has sponsored several activities to educate the public:

In 1988, musician Howard Jones performed at the PETAsponsored Animal Rights Music Festival, a concert that drew 35,000 people to the grounds of the Washington Monument.

■ In 1989, PETA sponsored Rock Against Fur, another concert featuring such artists as the B-52's and Jane Wiedlin.

■ The Psychedelic Furs and several other bands performed during the recent 1990 version of Rock Against Fur.

According to the review, PETA was contacted by a Maryland student who was concerned about the "cruel" glue traps used to control or kill mice in his school.

"PETA wrote to county and school officials to protest this cruel form of trapping and to offer humane alternatives and meet with the school district's pest management specialist," according to the review. McCabe depicted ALF as a wellorganized, highly-trained domestic terrorist organization and PETA as its above-ground media liaison. "We are a media liaison for ALF," Evans said. "When ALF (conducts laboratory raids), it will contact PETA, and we make their message public. We don't work with them. They contact us - we don't know how to contact them."

Although PETA does not advocate violence of any kind, it has never publicly denounced or condemned any of the illegal raids or other illegal acts committed by groups and individuals in behalf of animal rights, Evans said.

Furthermore, PETA has used, without remorse, information obtained in some of these illegal raids to inhibit researchers' progress, she

"You have to understand that (illegal raids) have been about the only way the public has been able to get into some labs, and it's our job to get that information out," Evans said.

During the past decade, illegal raids of research laboratories, many of the most severe ALF has claimed responsibility for, have caused nearly $10 million in damage in the United States, she wrote.

In many cases, McCabe added, the damage has disrupted research projects on crib death, infant blindness, cancer and AIDS.

In a public statement, issued April 21, 1989, James B. Wyngaarden, former director of the National Institutes of Health, said experiments conducted with the use of animals are essential to maintaining progress in medical research.

"I cannot envision how progress in our successful research efforts to improve human health could be maintained without continued reliance upon experimental animals, Wyngaarden said.

Research institutions are not the only victims of animal rightsinitiated terrorism, he said.

The ultimate cost of animal theft, laboratory destruction and other violent actions directed by animal rights groups toward scientists will be levied against those who wait for better medical treatments, according to Wyngaarden's statement.

In contrast, PETA contends that the National Institutes of Health AIDS researchers have needlessly killed chimpanzees in unsuccessful attempts to infect them with AIDS, Evans said.

AIDS researchers with the NIH are largely dependent on the use of chimpanzees in laboratories, said Leo Whitehair, director of Animal Research Resources for NIH.

"Because of their biological and anatomical similarities to humans, chimpanzees are often the only possible surrogate for humans in a laboratory setting," he said. But NIH researchers are not killing chimpanzees by infecting them with AIDS, Whitehair said. NIH researchers have learned that when the Human Immunodeficiency Virus, or HIV, is injected into chimps, they will become infected.

Chimps, however, do not become symptomatic or develop AIDS as a result of HIV infection, which causes AIDS in humans, Whitehair said.

Understanding why HIV-infected chimps do not develop AIDS is in the national interest, he said.

"Some of our best minds believe research in this area will soon lead to the development of an AIDS vaccine," Whitehair said.

However, no compromises will be allowed by PETA when animal rights are involved, Evans said, regardless of human needs and desires.

Pesticides

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1 According to the CES manual, excessive exposure to some herbicides usually results in death or recovery within 24 to 48 hours.

Pesticides can contaminate groundwater in a number of ways, Cress said. For example, a pesticide label might warn against applying a product in areas where there is standng water.

This is because the water will carry the pesticide with it - sometimes all the way down to the water table - as it is absorbed into the ground, he said.

Some experts say it is also dangerous to use pesticides during droughts.

During severe droughts, chemi-cals, including pesticides, accumulate on the earth's hard, dry surface, said Greg Crawford, director of public information for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

Sudden, intense rains can wash these chemical accumulations into private or public water supplies, such as rivers and lakes, Crawford said.

When this happens, however, there is usually only minimal danger of anyone getting poisoned, he said.

Chemicals dilute rapidly when washed into large rivers such as the Kansas River, which contains billions of gallons of flowing water,

Stagnant, polluted farm ponds, however, can pose a problem, he

In any case, all accidents or injuries involving pesticides should be reported to the state authorities, said Dale Armstrong, public affairs officer for the EPA.

The EPA would only investigate pesticide accidents occurring in Kansas upon request of the state," he said. "Kansas is one of many states that has been granted the authority by the federal government to enforce and administer all the federal (pesticide) requirements (that apply to Kansas).

Armstrong said Kansas was granted this authority because its pesticide regulations are, in many ways, stricter than the federal government's.

According to the CES manual, help can be obtained by immediately reporting any accident involving pesticides to the following agencies:

■ CHEMTREC, which is the National Agricultural Chemical Association Pesticide Safety Team Network. 1-800-424-9300.

■ The Environmental Protection Agency. (913) 236-2835.

■ The Kansas Board of Agriculture. (913) 296-2263.

■ The Kansas Department of Health and Environment. (913) 862-9360.

If the proposal is approved, resident teachers will be charged $10, analysis of out-of-state transcripts will cost $20 and foreign transcript analysis will cost $30.

Students graduating from the College of Education and seeking certification for the first time will not be charged.

Mike Holen, acting dean of the College of Education, said K-State has one full-time and several parttime staff members going over transcripts of these applicants.
"It's not an academic function,"

Holen said, "but a service to the state. This will help to stop it from draining money away from academics."

The proposal to the board said it is common for universities to assess fees for processing these types of applications, and out-of-state applicants often express surprise when they learn there there is no processsing fee charged by the regents schools.

The Aggieville renovation has left many building sides and alleyways exposed, Ball said. Other merchants have expressed a desire to have similar work done to the building sides in the future.

Nelson said if the camp-out system is used next fall, the committee will work to prevent people from camping out before the flag is raised.

"At least with the camp-out, students have some ability to help themselves," Nelson said.

It's not that hard for off-campus groups to organize, they just need to sit down and do it, he said. McIntyre said replacing student seats with general admission was not a good idea. Students would miss class all season waiting for tickets, rather than missing classes for a few days during the camp-out, he said.

People at schools such as the University of Kansas camp out for weeks before individual games, McIntyre said. A little organization consolidates the camp-outs.

Panelist Brenda Sedlacek, senior in political science, said some of the options appear to be viable.

"The question is — will we like the changes after we have had them for a while?" she said.

"No matter what we do, no one will be completely happy," Nelson said. "Someone will always be dissatisfied."

The decision to have lunchtime guards is determined by the Pedestrian Crossing Board based on the crossing guards' logs, said Lt. G.R. Grubbs, traffic division supervisor of the Riley County Police Department.

When new crossing guards are needed, the RCPD puts an advertisement in the newspaper. RCPD looks for dedicated, mature and trustworthy people to be crossing guards,

Student injured in scuffle at Kite's

By The Collegian Staff

A K-State student was injured early Thursday morning in an altercation at Kite's Bar & Grill. Rilev County Police have arrested a man in connection with the incident.

Jeff Lunsford, sophomore in business administration, received 64 stitches at the Saint Mary Hospital after being cut in the lower back with a knife during a scuffle in Kite's.

Lt. Buddy Mays of the Riley County Police Department said Douglas Cade was arrested for aggravated battery. Cade is currently being held in the Riley County Jail on $1,000 bond.

Lunsford said the incident started when three men started talking to a woman in the bar. After she walked into another room the men started talking about her in a derogatory manner. Lunsford, who had previously dated the woman, asked them to stop talking about her.

When they didn't, Lunsford and the men started pushing each other. At this point, one of the men who was behind him pulled a knife and cut him in the lower back.

Steve Rulo, a sophomore in business administration who witnessed the incident, was talking to the manager of Kite's in the alley behind the bar while trying to help Lunsford into a car to be taken the hospital. Then one of the three males involved in the incident came around the corner, and ran east down the alley. Rulo chased after him, and tackled him behind The Spot, a bar about a block from Steve Kuhn, owner of Kite's, said he didn't know the details about the incident, and hadn't seen the completed police report. He said he wasn't at the bar at the time the incident occurred, and hadn't talked yet to the manager, Ed Thomas.

Residents rescued from fire

Firefighters Mike Brumbau, in front, and Tim Davenport hose down the roof of one of two extensively damaged buildings at the Evergreen Apartments, 1122-1126 Gardenway, early Thursday morning.

Blaze started in closet, spread up open stairwell

By Tomari Quinn Staff Reporter Erwin Seba

Firefighters rescued several residents of a west-side apartment complex after an early morning fire Thursday.

No one was injured in the 4 a.m. fire that damaged two buildings. Flames prevented residents from escaping through exits on the upper levels of the complex.

The Evergreen Apartments at 1122-1126 Gardenway sustained structural damage when the fire spread from a storage shed at the bottom of a stairwell between two buildings of the complex, said Manhattan Fire Chief Bill Smith.

The fire is listed as suspicious, Smith said. Fire officials are interviewing witnesses and apartment residents as part of the investigation of the fire.

"We're listing it as suspicious because we have no common denominator confronting us that says a fire could have started there," he said.

Residents of the two damaged buildings said their smoke detectors did not go off until after their apartments had filled with smoke.

"If I had waited for my smoke alarm to go off ... where's the nearest morgue?" said Gordon Engle, a resident of the third floor of 1124 Gardenway.

Engle was rescued from the third floor landing of the stairwell where the fire began. He said the flames were knee-high on the landing.

'When I saw that ladder coming, I grabbed it and said, 'I got it, hold on. I'm coming down." Engle said. Many of the building's inhabitants were alerted to the fire by the shouts of people outside. Jeff Fleming, a resident of a third-floor apartment, said his smoke detector did not go off until almost too late.

"By the time we knew what was going on, the fire was at the door, and we couldn't get out," Fleming said. "We waited for the firemen and had to go down a ladder."

Fleming said his smoke alarm went off after the fire had come through his front door.

Residents of the apartments, alerted to the fire, helped others

"Around 3:30 a.m., I heard someone outside screaming and hollering for us to get out of the building," said Dave Walker, resident of the apartment complex. "When I came out, only the second stairwell was on fire. My apartment was a little

The only exit from several apartments was the exposed wood stairwell that was consumed in flames, Smith said. Although it was the only exit, it was in compliance with fire

The stairwell also provided a route for the fire to move to the upper level of the complex.

"The fire went up the stairwell to (complex) 1124, which houses six apartments," Smith said.

The complex is divided into three apartment buildings, and the storage closet where the fire appeared to start was between the first two buildings.

Smith said two people were trapped in the building when the fire engines arrived. In addition to Engle's rescue from the stairwell, one woman was rescued from a third-story window.

Witnesses at the scene said two people were rescued from the third story window and one from the balcony.

Some of the residents said the response time of the fire department

Raymond K. Moore, President of Faculty Senate at the University of Kansas, said in his report to the board that the Faculty Senate Presidents Committee had reservations about the implementation of restricted fees and that more studies should be done before it is approved.

"We feel there needs to be a more concise definition of the intent of restricted fees," he said. "We don't want restricted fees to be used as a supplement for state funding, and we're concerned about that.

Moore said the committee also feared a fee like the engineering fee could justify other academic departments' needs for an extra fee, espe-

There will be no end to the number of schools and colleges that can claim a need," he said.

SGA to sponsor class walk-out, statehouse rally

Collegian Reporter

Members of Student Governing Association are coordinating a student walk-out of classes and a lobbying trip to Topeka Wednesday to seek legislative support for restoring K-State's enrollment adjustment.

We want to make it very obvious that we, as students and voters, are very concerned," said Fred Wingert, chief of staff to the student body president.

The plan consists of students leaving campus at 8 a.m. Wednesday and car pooling to the Capitol to discuss the issue with legislators and listen to them debate it in

The organizers are planning to leave Topeka around 3 p.m. in order to make it back to K-State for a rally scheduled for 4 p.m. on the lawn east of Anderson Hall. Mike Steinle, state and community affairs director, and Student Body President Todd Johnson will speak. Steinle said other possible speakers include Steve Miller, director of athletics, and Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life.

SGA members also plan to have information tables in the K-State Union on Monday and Tuesday to collect student names and identification numbers on a petition supporting full funding of the enrollment enhancement proposal.

Besides SGA, the Associated Students of Kansas plans to help with tables in the residence halls food service areas and a banner between Lafene Student Health Center and Farrell Library.

Amy Miller, sophomore in management and marketing and ASK policy council member, said ASK is combining efforts with SGA to emphasize that every student is affected.

"We are going to be hurt significantly more than other schools. This is a K-State issue," said Wingert, who called the proposed enrollment adjustment amount possibly the worst budget cut in 10 years. The House-Senate conference committee's recommendation to cut the $4.68 million estimated enrollment enhancement bill by $2.1 million will affect K-State's base operating budget.

'We are not advocating not going to class. This is the best investment in an education students at K-State can make," Wingert said.

SGA members are not alone in their efforts. Sue Peterson, assistant to President Jon Wefald, and John Fairman, assistant vice president of University relations, are helping out, Steinle said. Several SGA members used Alumni Association phone lines Wednesday to contact alumni throughout the state and encourage them to persuade others to lobby their district representatives. Steinle said 15 callers contacted at least 275 alumni.

"If there ever was a reason to skip classes this is it. I think that most of the faculty members would support this," Wingert said. Richard Clubb, assistant professor of psychology and one of Wingert's teachers, said the idea is good one. "It's very beneficial to the University. I wouldn't penalize any of student for that," he said.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said that the Legislature will start the wrap-up session Wednesday. Hochhauser said she prefers students not miss class.

Campaign organized to continue progress

By Anne Krauss Collegian Reporter

The face of K-State has altered drastically over the past 20 years. Among the changes, Bramlage Coliseum has been built, Nichols Hall has been renovated, and the number of scholarships available to students has been increased.

But members of the University administration, the KSU Foundation and the KSU Alumni Association wanted progress to continue. The $100 million Essential Edge Campaign was designed to help the University do just that, said Mark Moore, campaign director.

Organization for the campaign began in 1985. Potential leaders were identified, a new computer system and additional staff were put into place and research of potential donors began.

"A feasibility study revealed that we could raise $100 million over five years," Moore said.

He said the study also helped identify 11 project areas and the amounts that could be raised in each.

The 11 areas include intercollegiate athletics, a new art museum, the University libraries and the colleges of Agriculture, Arts and Sciences, Architecture and Design, Business Administration, Education, Engineering, Human Ecology and Veterinary Medicine.

Fund raising began in 1988 and will continue through 1993. Moore said alumni and friends of the University like to donate to areas with which they have a direct tie.

"When the goals for the campaign were established, they took into account the amount of alumni support likely for each project area," Moore

The formula for enrollment adjustments has changed over the years and would probably change again, he said. The state was planning a change of the enrollment adjustment program, and the Kansas Board of Regents also has developed a new set of O'Keefe said the figure decided on by the House and Senate was actually higher than the one they would have come up with using the new regents' formula. "They pursued that strategy under the assumption everything would hold in place," he said. "When you're doing planning you have to make some assumptions like that. Sometimes you're right, sometimes you're O'Keefe said general budgetary constraints were a big reason why the adjustment figure was reduced.

'I do understand it creates a problem for the University," he said. "But it's not unlike other state agencies. There are a lot of belts being tightened this year.

"It's like when a student goes to K-State and he is told what the fees will be when he enrolls, but the next year they go up," he said. "He can say you didn't tell me this. You can't do this because you promised me something different. O'Keefe said it was unreasonable for an institution to expect guaranteed future funding.

"To do that would imply that we can forecast revenues and problems years in advance," O'Keefe said. That's an unreal expectation."

University officials agreed that the enrollment adjustment has been changed in the past and is scheduled to be amended again, but disagreed with O'Keefe's contention that the University shouldn't expect the promised increase scheduled by the present formula.

"He is mixing apples and oranges," said John Fairman, assistant vice president of University relations.

Soviets cut Baltic gas supply

World

VILNIUS, U.S.S.R. (AP) - The Kremlin tightened its economic squeeze Thursday on Lithuania by shutting off more than 80 percent of the Baltic republic's gas supply following a complete cutoff of oil the previous night.

The independence-minded republic promptly ordered that the first to lose their energy supplies will be Soviet military bases and factories run by Moscow, according to the parliament's press office.

Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev started his most drastic attempt to force Lithuania to retreat from its March 11 declaration of independence late Wednesday when a pipeline to Lithuania's only oil refinery was shut off. Lithuanian Energy Minister Leonas Asmantas ordered immediate gasoline rationing of 30 liters per month for private cars, according to Daina Kalendra of the parliamentary press office. A liter is slightly more than one quart.

Where we can give up the use of gas, gasoline, any heating or lighting, let us do this, and then we will be able to survive longer and, maybe, we will not be intimidated by these sanctions," government spokesman Ceslovas Jursenas said on Lithua-

Lithuania, forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Union in 1940, is entirely dependent on Moscow for its oil and gas, which it receives at below-market prices.

Soviet Foreign Ministry spokesman Vadim Perfiliev told reporters Thursday that Moscow "might have some other restrictions" to impose on Lithuania, but he refused to elaborate.

Leftists, Contras reach truce

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP) - Nine years of civil war that took 30,000 lives appeared near an end Thursday when Contra guerrillas, leftist Sandinistas and the incoming government agreed to a truce and a deadline for the rebels to disarm.

With this accord we conclude the peace process that started with the elections," said Antonio Lacayo, senior negotiator for President-elect Violeta Barrios de Chamorro, after the accords were read at a dawn news conference.

The accord sets a cease-fire that began at noon Thursday; the withdrawal of Sandinista military forces at least 12 miles from the borders of five security zones, to be completed by Saturday; and the immediate gathering of all Contra fighters within the zones. About 9,000 Contras fighters are in Nicaragua.

An addendum said the Contras will start turning in their weapons on Wednesday afternoon, April 25, after Chamorro takes office from President Daniel Ortega, with the Contra fighting force to be disbanded completely by June 10.

Rose to plead in tax case

CINCINNATI (AP) - Former baseball star Pete Rose will plead guilty Friday to tax offenses that could mean up to six years in jail, as part of a plea bargain ending a yearlong investigation, according to documents unsealed Thursday.

The documents disclosed in U.S. District Court show that Rose has agreed to plead guilty to two felony counts of filing false tax returns by failing to report income from memorabilia sales, autograph signings and personal appearances.

The plea bargain bars the government from pressing more serious felony tax charges against the former Cincinnati Reds star, who was banned from baseball last year for gambling.

There is no agreement on sentencing for Rose, who is scheduled to appear before U.S. District Judge S. Arthur Spiegel on

Hrs: M.-F. 9-6, Th. 9-8, Sat. 9-5

Spiegel could sentence Rose to a maximum three years in jail on each count and fine him as much as $500,000.

Rose admits in the documents that he under-reported his income by $355,000 from 1984-87, and owed additional taxes of $162,703.

During those years, his tax returns showed taxable income of $4.6 million. Rose paid $2 million in taxes over that period, according to court documents.

Harassment case settled

TOPEKA (AP) - A firefighter who sued the city over her claim of racial and sexual harassment will receive a $185,000

The payment for Denita Council, including $5,737 for psychiatric bills and $180,000 for emotional damages, was approved Wednesday on a 7-0 vote of the Topeka city council. The council, which had considered the case in executive session, approved the settlement without discussion.

Trial of her lawsuit, filed in August 1988, had been expected to start before the end of May in U.S. District Court. Council, a black who became a firefighter in 1985, claimed she was subjected to racial slurs, sexual remarks and unequal She had said that she was made to walk to another station after being transferred, and that past department practice was for firefighers to be transported to a new assignment. She also said a department lieutenant once told her that if firefighters didn't like someone on the force, they could push them down the stairs or an elevator shaft at a fire.

Her attorney, Stephen W. Cavanaugh, said that several weeks after she admitted she was afraid of snakes, a dead snake was placed on the sun visor of her car and fell on her. He said a psychiatrist she saw after that incident diagnosed her as having acute and chronic post-traumatic stress syndrome.

Cavanaugh said one of the terms of the settlement calls for Council, who has been on extended sick leave since last summer, to resign. He said she plans to return to the South, possibly to Florida.

Band to perform tonight

Ipso Facto, the "Best Unsigned Band in the World" according to Yamaha's Band Explosion '89, will perform in the K-State Union Ballroom tonight at 8 p.m. for a reggae dance concert.

"It will be a dance and a concert," said Raelyn Clark, junior in industrial engineering and Union Program Council Eclectic Entertainment Committee member.

Eclectic Entertainment and the Multi-Cultural Student Council are co-sponsoring the event, said Mike Ribble, graduate adviser for the committee. He described the five-member group as a "reggae, rock, world beat group out of Minnesota.

Ipso Facto performed at the 1986 Sun Splash festival in Jamaica, the only American band invited, Ribble said. It has toured with headliners such as UB40, Ziggy Marley and the Clash, he said.

Mark Dalton, senior in pre-professional secondary education and member of the Eclectic Entertainment Committee, heard Ipso Facto perform at the regional conference of the National Association of Campus Activities in the fall and brought the band to the committee's attention.

The band was booked in November, said Ribble, and a contract was signed in January.

CAMPUS BULLETI

Campus organizations are encouraged to use the Campus Bulletin. All ar nouncements must be submitted by 11 a.m. one day prior to publication. Announcements for Monday's bulletin must be in by 11 a.m. Friday. However, publication is determined by the amount of space available on a first-come, first-served basis and is NOT guaranteed. Information forms are available on the shelf outside Kedzie 118A. You must have a picture ID to submit a Bulletin form. During business hours, IDs will be checked in Kedzie 103. At other times, IDs will be checked in Kedzie 116 or 118A. Forms should be left in the box outside 118A after being filled out and checked. Questions should be directed to the Collegian's campus editors in Kedzie 116.

Chemical use laws unclear

Science Reporter

Despite growing concern about the dangers involved with pesticide use, in many instances the law does not clearly define how or when chemical pest controls can be used. This is perhaps best exemplified by laws governing pesticide use in residential areas, particularly apartment For example, many apartment dwellers prefer, primarily for safety reasons, that their landlords avoid using chemicals to control bugs in their apartments. The law, however, does not appear to offer tenants much latitude in preventing landlords from doing so. According to the Kansas Residential Landlord and Tenant Act, landlords have the right to enter occupied apartments they own at a reasonable hour after giving reasonable notice to the tenant. They may enter the apartments, for example, to inspect the premises or make necessary repairs, according to the KRLTA.

The act also states a landlord may, within reason, enter an apartment without the tenant's consent to prevent or respond to situations involving a health hazard or potential destruction of his or her property.

One of the problems that typically arises when trying to interpret this law is that the term reasonable is not clearly defined, said Mary Horsch, press secretary for Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan.

For example, no specific time limit has been included to define what reasonable notice is, she said.

Although landlords can enter to make necessary repairs, which would include spraying for bugs to prevent property damage, the law fails to define clearly whether landlords can use chemicals in occupied apartments against the will of his or her tenants, Horsch said.

But landlords are liable for anything they put in the apartments they own, she said.

A problem could occur, therefore, if a landlord painted an apartment he or she owned with paint that contained lead. If a child ate the paint and became poisoned, the landlord would probably have to assume at least a portion of the responsibility for the injury, Horsch said.

In any case, she said, the law is so vague that the courts have to determine on a case-by-case basis whether a landlord's right to use chemicals to protect his or her property supercedes a tenant's right not to be exposed to chemicals.

"The landlord's need to use chemicals would have to be weighed against the level of risk his use of a chemical would pose to tenants,"

Although she could cite no legal See LAW, Page 6

Sunday is Earth Day 1990, a day of celebration and education about the environment.

Earth Day 1990 seeks to inform people about the state of the environment today and let them know what steps they can take to help

"We want to focus on what individuals can do for the environment," said Karen McCulloh, ac- nator from Wisconsin, is sometivities coordinator at UFM. "For example, just turn the water off when brushing your teeth. Just do very, very simple things."

There wasn't a popular environmental movement until about 1970. The first Earth Day that year helped to transform a fairly specialized interest into a pervasive, popular one.

Gaylord Nelson, then a U.S. se-times referred to as the father of Earth Day because he was instrumental in getting it off the ground. He is now counselor of the Wilderness Society.

County residents offered solid waste disposal site

By Bryan Ackley Science Reporter

Riley County residents will have an opportunity Saturday to take action against one of the state's most pressing environmental problems non-point source pollution.

Non-point source pollution, a component of the nation's solid waste disposal problem, is exactly what its name implies, said Riley County Planning Director Monty

This type of pollution includes all of the waste and litter that has been disposed of, some illegally, by individuals who cannot be identified or accounted for, he said.

"I can't even begin to get into all the problems caused by non-point source pollution," Wedel said. As a group, household hazardous materials are one of the largest components of the state's non-point source pollution problem, he said. According to a Water Pollution Control Federation publication, every home in the United States contains three to 10 gallons of materials that are harmful to humans and the environment.

From 8 a.m. to 3 p.m. on Saturday, however, county residents can dispose of their unneeded household hazardous materials by taking them to

New Kids source of inspiration, wisdom

"We're not these big, perfect, awesome dudes who can do anything, and I hope fans don't think we are. We're equal to our fansin fact, we're just like them!" - Joe, New Kids on the Block et Audra Dietz have her Aggieville. Let Eric Henry have his Zen. Let Brad Seabourn have his religion. I have found a new guru to mould my life after. In fact, I have found an entire group of them. They are Donnie, Danny, Jordan, Joe and Jon. They are the New Kids on Oh, I was skeptical at first. Like many nonbelievers, I had my doubts about the New Kids. I thought they were a cheesy, pre-fab group created to fill a perceived gap in the record industry's markets, similar to the Monkees. Although it should be pointed out that the Monkees were actually stars of a television show before their music became a hit.

I thought the New Kids couldn't sing. I thought they couldn't dance. I thought the world would be a much better place without them. Then I saw the book, their biography: "New Kids on the Block" by Grace Catalano, whose previous credits include the riveting

"Kirk Cameron: Dream Guy," "River Phoe-nix: Hero & Heart-throb" and "Alyssa Milano: She's the Boss." I thought the book was cheesy. After all, the oldest New Kid is only Dwayne 21 years old; they couldn't have that much to Lively write about.

But the book was more than just pulp trash. More than just a marketing ploy. It was a book of wisdom. Ponder this quote from the "On Tiffany" section of "New Kids Quotes" in the book:

"She's great. She's one of the nicest people you would want to meet. She's just genuinely nice. We all really like Tiffany a lot."

Whoa. That's powerful. That kind of friendship is really moving. We should all be so dedicated to the people whose concerts we were asked to open for. Jon, incidentally, is dating Tiffany. Also notice that, while he said good things about her personality, Donnie mentioned nothing about Tiffany's musical ability. That's another important lesson, kids; if you can't say anything nice, don't say anything at all.

But as the quote at the start of this column shows, New Kids' appeal is not just in their music. It is in their ability to keep their music at a level no better than that of their average fan. This way no one feels like the New Kids are just flaunting their musical abilities, like Eric Clapton, B.B. King, and that drummer for Rush does. I mean, is a four-minute drum solo really necesary?

Out of this spirit of equality, New Kids offer us hope for a peaceful future. As Donnic says, "Peace out! Say no to drugs!" Danny also points out that real world change " ... goes back to the individual" and that if we change ourselves for the better "then the world will be a lot better." This, incidentally, is evidence that Michael Jackson in fact stole the song "Man in the Mirror" from the then pre-pubescent New Kids, essentially stealing all the money that should have gone to them,

Yet, despite this set back, the New Kids have a good outlook on life. As Joe so eloquently puts it, his only goals are "To be rich and famous, but most of all, to have peace of mind." Isn't that what Nirvana is all about? And Joe's ideal woman also reveals that his priorities are in the right place. All he wants is a girl who is "cool, chill, smart and fine." What else is there?

'm certain there are still a few skeptics among you. I know it will take you a while to believe. If you still have doubts, listen to the New Kids acknowledge the people who have influenced them; Jordan "My mother and my producer ', Jon "My mom ...", Joe " ... family and friends", Donnie ... apparently has no influences, but his favorite television show is Sesame Street, and Danny ... also has no influences, but his most prized moments are the ones he spends with his Mom. They all have the right influences; the family.

I know, I know. The skeptical will say that since the New Kids only range in age from 17-21 that they probably couldn't have had a great many influences outside of their family Yeah, true, but they could have mentioned one of their grammar school teachers, so

Plus, the New Kids are city kids, so they would have been influenced by the city. As Jordan puts it, "We're city kids. They say we're street kids, but we're really not street kids. We're city kids who hung out on the streets." Notice the distinction he draws between the two types of influences. Being a street kid would have destroyed their great sense of family, but being city kids who hung out on streets gave them not only a strong family influence, but also the strong, gritty rhythms and lyrics that typify their unique style of music.

Coming out of this background, you can see why the New Kids are truly visionaries. As Earth Day is rolling around this Sunday, I'd like to leave you with one last New Kids Quote, one by Joe, that I feel captures the true spirit of environmentalism and Earth Day; "I would change the way we treat the environment, like pollution."

I'm utterly speechless.

Earth Day opportunity to become involved

Sunday is Earth Day 1990.

planned to celebrate the day and educate the public about the importance of saving the environment.

Karen McCulloh, coordinator of Manhattan's Earth Day activities, said most of the things people can do to help save the environment are "very, very simple."

Simple things include separating trash and recycling it, conserving water and walking or bicycling instead of driving.

These are all concepts most of today's college students were first exposed to in elementary school. Remember Woodsy Owl?

The message failed to sink in,

Today's college students, along with the rest of society, are responsible for generating millions of tons of waste each year.

Each year since 1970, a year in which many of today's college students were crawling about in their A number of activities are disposable diapers, Earth Day has been celebrated.

> And the environment has continued to decline.

This year, it's fashionable to be an environmentalist. Earth Day has gone commercial. MTV runs oneminute ads informing its audience of environmental problems like acid rain. A veritable galaxy of television stars are getting together Sunday for a two-hour Earth Day special.

Earth Day is a worthwhile cause. The Earth is in trouble because of society's thoughtless destruction of the environment. Earth Day is likely to persuade some people to stop polluting and start recycling.

Environmentalism should not be a cause that falls in and out of fashion. The true measure of Earth Day 1990's success will be participation in Earth Day 1991.

Editor,

Let's forget for a moment whether or not Jim's Journal is dumb, and if God or Brad Seaboum's existence can be scientifically proven, and deal with a more pertinent issue.

At some time or other during your college career, it is very likely you will have the opportunity to use the handicapped services at

If you have ever been on crutches or otherwise physically limited on our campus, I'm sure you no doubt became aware many of the buildings lack sufficient provisions for the handicapped.

Take the K-State Union for instance. While it is a fairly new building and does have elevators, it doesn't have handicapped access to its recreational level.

Kedzie Hall is an example of a building where concessions to the physically limited have been made. However, these concessions only work if your class is on the first level. The other thing about Kedzie's improvements is when they added them on the facilities for physically limited students they put them on the opposite side of the building from the handicapped parking.

So far, I have only shown the negative, when in fact this issue has a positive side, which is the shuttle bus. The shuttle is a legislatively-funded van equipped for easy access by the physically limited. The shuttle is available to any person who is physically limited. The shuttle is a student service that is entirely government funded. The only monies K-State students pay into this service are for advertising. From experience, many will tell you that when it's time to do your stint on crutches, the shuttle bus can be a very welcome sight. Personally, I just want to thank everyone who made my days on crutches more bearable. Thank you.

Build bike paths

Shuttle appreciated school and this is what is helping to create the problem. The problem is students who don't ride bikes to school are being nearly run over by bike riders as they are walking from class to class, especially through the center of campus, where there are no bike paths.

What needs to be done to rectify the problem is two-fold. First, the student body needs to be informed of the fact that it is illegal to ride a bicycle on campus sidewalks and that there is a $10 fine if the campus police catch them. The second step to help alleviate the problem is to get K-State to build sufficient bike paths around campus so that bike riders don't have to use the sidewalks to get to class.

I would like to encourage all students to ask their student senators to help get the administration to build more bike paths on campus, especially through the center of the campus. Let us all help to make our sidewalks

Respect campus

If you can bear further commentary on the state of K-State lawns, here is my contribution. Our lawns provide, in microcosm, an example of what ecologist Garret Hardin called "the tragedy of the commons." We all share in the benefits of these green, open areas and are entitled to a portion of their production (biomass, beauty, walking space or whatever). The problem begins when we try to take out more than the sustainable yield of the common area. Each tries to raise an extra sheep, take a short cut, drop some litter, pick some flowers.

The damage done by any one thoughtless person may be repairable but if done by 20,000 or even 1,000, it is like having herds of buffalo loose. The administration has recognized this and taken a rational, if ugly, approach to the problem. Paving it over definitely reduces the mud. In other places they have planted large bushes which will deter all but the most determined (I have seen students fight their way through dense pyracantha rather than walk fifty feet). Only judicious installation of barbed wire and land mines would prevent the truly lazy and stubborn from going their own way.

Unfortunately the discussions I have heard to date do not include ecological awareness and keeping off the grass in the proposed common University degree requirements. Perhaps UFM could develop a course, or fraternities and sororities could take as a project the education of their members who in turn could enforce good behavior as part of their social responsibility pledge.

The most effective solution is the least likely to be attainable. That is for each reader of this paper to pick up their own trash (including throw-away inserts to the paper), stay off the grass, and leave the flowers for others to see. Only by developing a mature and responsible community are we likely to have such a miracle happen. But that is no reason

Thank Hochhauser

Editor,

As we organize to urge the legislature to honor its commitment to provide enrollment adjustment monies to K-State it is important that we recognize the people who have already been fighting for us in the Legislature. Particularly, we should thank Sheila Hochhauser, Representative from the 67th district, for her untiring efforts this legislative Sheila chairs the task force on higher education and was instrumental in bringing to the floor amendments supporting K-State. These include: restoring shrinkage funds, raising student salaries, release of tuition fees, the restoration of full enrollment adjustment (carried by Hochhauser), and a fallback position (carried by Rep. Katha Hurt) to restore $1 million in adjustment.

We need to build on the work Sheila has done. Let us join together in urging other members of the Legislature to honor the contract they made regarding enrollment adjustments. As an aside, if you want to talk to Hochhauser, she will be at the Eggs and Issues Breakfast (location to be announced by the Chamber of Commerce) Saturday, and at St. Isidore's Chapel, 711 Denision, Sunday, 3 to 5 p.m.

Non-profit organization works to enhance K-State, aids in achieving fund raising goals

By Tomari Quinn Staff Reporte

More than 50 years ago, a nonprofit organization was established to aid K-State in raising funds.

Now, that organization has complete autonomy and flexibility in handling gifts for the maximum benefit to the University.

Created in 1944, the KSU Foundation was originally known as the K-State Endowment Association with the intent of being a non-profit educational corporation charted in the state of Kansas.

The Foundation was inspired by another Big Eight school. In 1892, alumni of the University of Kansas discovered that contributions to the school were going to the state of Kansas as a state agency, rather than to the University because of the existing state laws, said Art Loub, president of the Foundation.

The alumni of KU established what is still known as the KU Endowment Association - the first non-profit corporation established for the benefit of a public institution in the United States.

Loub said the mission of the KSU Foundation is to identify and develop new initiatives of fund raising and to act as a consultant and contractor for the University.

"Basically our goal is to enhance and help the University and alumni achieve their goals in the area of fund raising, fiduciary services, public relations and other special services in the private sector," Loub said.

In order to champion these results, a complex and diverse organizational tier of volunteers and staff is required.

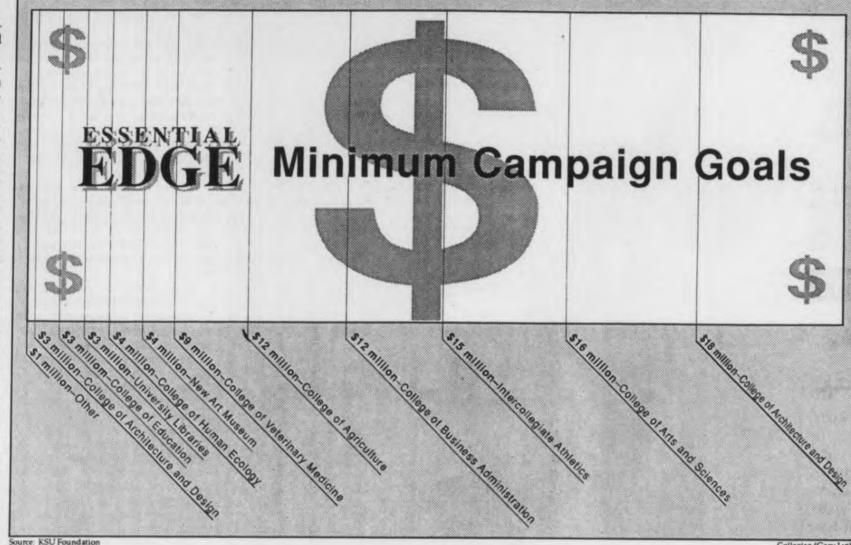

Loub said the staff organization handles the day-to-day operation of the Foundation and is broken down into operating departments of fundraising and fiduciary responsibilities.

Board of Trustees," he said. "It has a maximum membership of 175

Loub said one becomes a member of the Board of Trustees through a nominating process in which credentials are assessed by a committee. About 94 percent of the members of the Board of Trustees are also President's Club members.

To become a member of the President's Club, one must have given or pledged $10,000 to K-State on an outright basis or made a planned gift of $25,000 or more, he said.

members who are also members of the President's Club because of a common tendency in fund raising, Loub said.

Often the best solicitors - people who do the best job in raising money are those who are also major contributors to the University, he said.

"Those people have two things going for them in a financial commitment," Loub said. "They have shown broad-based trustee board - the University. They can go to other peo- said. ple and ask for similar support.

He said in addition to the enthusiasm and spiritual dedication to K-State by the volunteers, there is usually some level of financial

"That certainly enhances one's chances of becoming a member of the Board of Trustees," Loub said. "Obviously, these same people are looked upon by the staff and other volunteer leadership in their own communities to help in fund raising activities."

Trustees are looked upon to assist There is a high ratio of Trustee the Foundation and University administration in sponsoring events to enhance overall advancement of the institution and give counsel in matters pertaining to policy and program activities, Loub said.

From the broad-based Board of Trustees is chosen an executive committee of 15 members who serve to define the on-going policy and operations of the Foundation. All members of the executive committee are "On the volunteer side, we have a demonstratively their support of the also in the President's Club, Loub

The majority of the executive committee might even be benefactors by the end of the Essential Edge Campaign," he said. "That is, they would have given $100,000 to the University.

Loub said 13 members of the executive committee are elected by the Board annually. The other two members are appointed by virtue of their position — the national president of the alumni association and the president of the University.

The executive committee has wide-ranging responsibilities that include fund raising, company management, fiscal management and the management of trusts, Loub said. "I guess I'd say the executive committee is comprised of the most dedicated, hard working alumni and friends of K-State that you can imagine," he said. The executive committee meets at least eight times a year in regular session, Loub said. Each member of the executive committee usually serves on one to three different subcommittees. These are outstanding leaders, and all are extremely knowledgeable," he said. "These are among our most informed alumni, without a question." Loub said the individuals on the board represent both a geographic and collegial diversity.

We have alumni and friends of K-State who represent different colleges," Loub said. "They represent different communities.'

One point in common for each of the members is assisting the Foundation in its goal of enhancing K-State financially, he said.

"An organization as large and diverse as the Foundation needs people with all kinds of expertise," Loub said. "We deal with farms, public relations, banking, investments such a wide range of things there is never a lack of opportunity to use people with talent and to have them with us as volunteer leaders."

Loub sees no conflict when a trustee is also a Manhattan businessman.

"By in large, the members of the Board of Trustees represent the business community," he said. "These are the people who have become very successful, who have run successful businesses, who manage property and people.

"They understand how things have to be done. They have been active in volunteerism — some of them for many years. They're highly experienced and knowledgeable individuals."

Loub said people of such caliber bring the Foundation a level of sophistication and expertise that is needed for success.

"Dedication and desire to be helpful is important, but having demonstrated success in your personal life and pursuit of business is even more important from our perspective because we're running a non-profit or-ganization," he said. "We're in business to help Kansas State University. And so, business leaders have to sit in judgment of what we're doing. So we look upon that as a tremendous asset for us.'

Loub's duty is to bring together the many aspects of the organization.

"It is my responsibility to tie the groups of staff and volunteers together," Loub said.

As president of the Foundation, Loub is chief executive officer and chief operating officer of the staff, a non-voting member of the executive committee and works with the volunteers.

He also assists the volunteers in undertaking goals and objectives outlined by the Board of Trustees and works in concert with the board's leadership in the development of leadership policies implemented by

"I wear two hats in this regard," he said. "It is my responsibility to carry out the mandate of executive committee and of the Board of Trustees."

The goal of the Foundation is to raise $100 million for the University through the Essential Edge Campaign, the plans for which began in 1985 and 1986.

"Following the Bramlage Coliseum campaign, we knew there were wide-spread needs at the University that had to be addressed," Loub said. "A committee was appointed that included volunteer leaders, deans and University administration. We tried to address some of the particular needs of the institution.

A feasibility study then gave form to the particular, outstanding needs of K-State in the area of professorships, scholarships, a new art museum and University libraries, Loub

The broad context of the recommendations was reduced, and specific dollar amounts were arrived at for the individual goals of the project.

"So we have 11 campaigns being organized and conducted simultaneously in the context of cooperation and total support of the administration and of the individual colleges,"

Foundation assets exceed $72 million

Majority of donated gifts, interest reserved for specified colleges, organization needs

By Tomari Quinn Staff Reporte

The carrying value for assets of the KSU Foundation has exceeded $72 million, but the money is not the Foundation's to spend.

"It may look as though the Foundation has $70 or $80 million worth of assets, but in reality the Foundation operates just like a bank does," Art Loub, president of the Foundation, said. "A bank can have $200 million worth of assets, but that's not the bank's money to give

"We operate in the same fashion," he said. "The overwhelming amount of money that we have is not owned by the Foundation."

The estimated fair market value of assets for the Foundation increased to more than $80 million as of June 30, 1989. The carrying value of those assets is more than $72

The carrying value of an asset is the price at which the stocks were acquired, while market value is the price the stocks would bring on the open market. Market value can increase or decrease the carrying

A majority of the gifts the Foundation receives are designated to a particular college or organization and are invested accordingly, Loub said. Interest collected from investments go to the designated areas. If undesignated, the money goes to the area of greatest University need. Loub said the Foundation's asset base, in land or equities, should be looked upon as an asset base that furthers the goals of the University.

The Foundation is unable to provide funds to build a major addition to any building on campus, he said, including Farrell Library. "We don't have the fundings to build additions of that magnitude," Loub said. "Most of our investments are long-term endowments, and they are in pooled income He said the Foundation has a fiduciary responsibility to invest and manage the funds and to provide for the purposes of the funds. 'We can't invade those funds for purposes other than what they were designated for by the donor," Loub In about 95 percent of the gifts, the donor determines what area of the University will benefit from the donation, Loub said. 'We're bound by whatever the donor wants when we acknowledge the gift," he said. "There are probably 2,000 different accounts that we run for the benefit of the colleges and the departments in the University.

Loub said all money received by the Foundation is invested in some manner, except money which is allowed to be put to immediate use.

"An example of an immediately expendable fund would be when an individual sends in x amount of dollars to support a scholarship," he said. "The scholarship might be awarded in August, and we might receive the money in June or July. We would put the money in an account and it's available in August.

"The rest of the money is put into accounts or short- or long-term investment returns.'

He said endowments are longterm returns in which donors give money to endow a particular program at K-State. The interest-income off the endowment is expended annually, but the endowment remains intact in perpetuity.

Fund raising is a main activity of the Foundation and includes annual giving, corporate and Foundation relations, planned giving and current capital campaigns such as Essential Edge, Loub said.

"We have a whole area involving fiduciary responsibilities, which involves the handling of funds and accounts, working with the University to help the University in such things as travel advances, and scholarship programs," he said.

Another of the Foundation's goals is to bring donors into the realm of the University.

"Donors are cultivated by different opportunities they have on campus - all the colleges, special activities such as athletics and Landon Lectures," he said. "All of these are opportunities for people to become involved in activities of K-tionship with the University and feel said, that person may continue to some urgency to support those activities in which they're involved.

"There is a reinforcement that goes on to bring people back into the orbit of involvement," he said. "People don't give money in a vacuum. People give money because they're involved in the process of what is being done."

Thousand of noble, good objectives on campus will go without funds, Loub said. The reason is not because the organizations are unworthy, but because it is hard for people who are not involved in an activity to feel inclined to support that organization's funding.

A campaign like Essential Edge will bring benefits to the University for years to come, Loub said.

"What typically happens in a major fund raising effort, such as the $100 million Essential Edge fund raising campaign, is there is a heightened awareness by the University community and alumni and friends of the needs of K-State," he

This uncovers new donors and develops them to the process of giving to the University, Loub said.

"It's not unreasonable to expect that people will continue to give at a significantly larger level than they might have previously," he said.

An example, Loub said, would be somebody who characteristically gives $100 per year. During the course of a campaign, that person might increase his or her gift to $200 per year for purposes of the fund-make out a $200 check out of habit and a heightened interest in University needs.

Essential Edge, kicking-off Saturday evening, is progressing according to plan, he said.

"I feel very good about the campaign," Loub said. "We have all of our projects organized. As you might expect when you're running a campaign of this magnitude, it's an enormous organizational challenge.

"I feel that our volunteer leadership and our staff have stepped up to the challenge and are moving ahead. We seem to be right on target as far as response is concerned. We're looking to a very successful kick-off and campaign.

Contributions for Essential Edge will be managed in the same way as all other contributions, Loub said. The funds will be designated for a particular purpose, and will go into those accounts.

"K-State leads the Big Eight in the percentage of alumni who give to K-State," he said. "It's in excess of 26 percent of the alumni are financial participants with the Foundation.'

Loub said public institutions typically have an average of alumni contributers in the 9 to 16 percent

"Having 26 percent of our alumni as donors puts us in a leadership position in the Big Eight," he said. "I attribute that to a very aggressive

Wildcats gear up for big homestand

When it entertains lowa State this weekend, the K-State baseball squad hopes not to have any of the troubles that Brian Culp had at second base Tuesday. The four-game homestand will be the final Big Eight home series for the 'Cats this season. The series begins tonight at 7. By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

With K-State just three victories away from the "magic number" established by Coach Mike Clark early in the conference play, the Wildcats will be host to Iowa State in a four-game series beginning with a single game at 7 p.m. at Frank Myers Field.

The Wildcats have nine wins thus far in Big Eight play. No team in the history of the conference tournament has won 12 Big Eight regular season games and failed to make the tourney field.

Twelve wins and you're in, or so goes the tune Clark has been singing. And history makes that tune sound even stronger.

"We've said all along that we think that number will get us in," said Clark, whose team is 9-3 in the Big Eight and 22-14 overall. "In fact, there's only been one time in history that 11 wins haven't gotten you in.'

Simple math, then, dictates that if the Wildcats can win two or three of the games this weekend against the Cyclones, K-State fans can make reservations for a trip to Oklahoma City and the Big Eight Tournament for the first time since 1985.

But first things first.

thought Iowa State was one of the top teams in the league," Clark said of the Cyclones, who are 4-4 in Big Eight play after splitting four-game sets with Missouri and Oklahoma. "And what makes them so tough is that they have a good nucleus of players who have been with them for a while."

The Cyclones are led by centerfielder Mike Weimerskirch, the third-leading hitter in the conference (all games) with a .394 mark. nine innings. Weimerskirch is sixth in the league in triples with two, ninth in the conference in homers with six, and is seventh in the loop in stolen bases with 14.

Another Iowa State outfielder rightfielder Tom Vantiger - is a potent offensive threat. Vantiger is ninth in the league (all games) in hitting with a .355 average, is sixth in the conference in doubles with 10, and is fifth in the loop in stolen bases with 15.

Toss in powerful Mike Busch, who is third in the league in homers with nine, and you've got a fairly potent offensive corps.

The Cyclones also have one of the Big Eight's hottest pitchers in sophomore Kent Cesler, Just named the Big Eight Pitcher of the Week for his performance last weekend against Oklahoma, is 2-0 in conference play.

Cesler's overall mark is a perfect 5-0, and he sports a 3.93 ERA. His conference stats, which include a sparkling 1.00 ERA, are even more impressive. Against Oklahoma in a 5-1 win, he struck out 10 Sooners.

Cesler, the likely starter for the Cyclones in tonight's series opener, will face another of the league's toughest hurlers in K-State's David Hierholzer.

Hierholzer is coming off a career-"At the beginning of the season, I high 12-strikeout performance last weekend in a 4-1 win over Missouri at Frank Myers.

Player of week Twyner sees room

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

When he left the playing surface at Frank Myers Field last Saturday night on crutches, L.J. Twyner wasn't exactly thinking about earning any individual honors from the Big Eight office in the near future.

He was thinking more about the condition of a sprained ankle he had suffered in the first game of a doubleheader that evening against

And yet, less than three days after he appeared on the shelf for at least a game, the highest individual honor the conference awards a player on a

And get this - Twyner, less than 15 hours after leaving the field on crutches, played the final game of the Missouri series Sunday in centerfield.

Nothing keeps the transfer from Western Oklahoma State Junior College down, it seems. But his coach, Mike Clark, was quick to point out that Twyner and his teammates are taking the winning of awards in stride.

"I think that things like this take the players somewhat by surprise because they're so focused on team

The week that was for Twyner centerfielder. produced the following num 9-for-15 at the plate for a .600 batting average; seven runs scored; four RBIs; two sacrifices; and a homer, his first of the year.

Not a bad week, but the resulting honor surprised the winner.

"I was really kind of surprised to win. I felt I could have played a lot better, really," he said. "But I'm starting to feel a lot more confident. Everything is falling into place."

The confidence Tywner is playing with right now is the result of his familiarity with the roles he's now filling for K-State: leadoff man and

"I like to lead off," Twyner said of his position in the Wildcat batting order, which has helped him to the team lead in runs scored. "If I can come out and get the team going, then its a good thing for the team.

"Defensively, I feel a little more confident in center than in left, because the ball comes off the bat without the slice."

Twyner opened the season in center because of back surgery under-

And whether it is at the junior college level or in NCAA Division I, it's all the same to him.

"At first the transition was tough, but baseball is baseball," he said. Twyner, who stole 51 of 59 bases in junior college, has been successful just six of 12 times this year, due in part to his having been picked off first several times.

"I really don't know what's going on there, because I did a good job stealing bases at juco. Right now, I'm really not very good on the But where he plays isn't all that bases at all," he said.

Where Twyner does feel comfortable, however, is at the plate. With the exception of his selectivity, he's happy there.

"I feel like I could probably take more pitches at the plate. I've got to do that," he said. "And as my confidence goes up I will.

"But I'm hitting the ball on the ground a lot more now than I did at the start of the year, and I'm proud of that.

McGaughey finishes 2nd

K-State's Karen McGaughey finished in second place in the KU Relays heptathlon, with her best performance ever, at 4,805 points. Busarid Rogers of Pittsburg State finished in first place of the K-State record, set by Kim Hagger in 1980.

In the men's decathlon, K-State entries Terry VanLaningham and Steve Yoder finished fifth and eighth, respectively. VanLaningham piled up 6,508 point, while Yoder tallied 6,109.

Alexander transfers from KU

LAWRENCE - Freshman guard Todd Alexander will leave the Kansas basketball program to enroll at Washburn University, Coach Roy Williams announced Thursday.

Alexander, 6-2, played in 23 games in 1989-90, averaging just over one point and one rebound.

'This is a decision that Todd has made and it is not something we are asking him to do," Williams said. "Todd was going to be on full scholarship next year and I believe he would have played a great deal more than this past year. Todd basically feels he would fit in better at Washburn and in fact, one of his best friends, Andy Berlin, signed there last week." Both Alexander and Berlin are from McPherson.

LAWRENCE - Rex Walters, a guard who averaged 17.6 points at Northwestern last season, will enroll at Kansas for the fall semester, Coach Roy Williams said Thursday.

The 6-foot-3 Walters, who is from Independence, Calif., was Northwestern's leading scorer as a sophomore last season and was an honorable mention Big Ten selection.

Falcons trade top pick

ATLANTA — The Atlanta Falcons and the Indianapolis Colts agreed today to a trade that would allow the Colts to draft Illinois quarterback Jeff George, but the deal is contingent on him signing by Friday, a newspaper reported.

Under the terms of the deal reported in today's late editions of The Atlanta Journal, the Falcons would get two players and a 1991 first-round draft pick, and the Colts would get George. To complete the trade, Indianapolis must sign George by an unspecified time on Friday, the Journal said.

Netters play at Colorado Sunday

By Dan Wicker Sports Reporter

Sunday marks the last Big Eight regular season match for the K-State tennis team, which will be travelling to Boulder, Colo., to face the

The team will leave today to get in a solid practice before the meet on Sunday, to help them get used to the drastic change in altitude, Coach Steve Bietau said.

"While the home and away issue might not be as big in tennis, the altitude issue is a big one," Bietau said. "It affects tennis because you use special high-altitude balls. The balls tend to sail a little bit farther."

The team, however, is not without some practice in the high altitude of the mountains. In early February, the women responded well.

"We arranged our schedule so that we would play at BYU this year, the same year we played at Colorado, because you play in the altitude there," Bietau said. "It is an adjustment, but one that they have made already. We adjusted to it fine and played a good match against BYU.

Colorado is a team that has had some success in the Big Eight Conference. The match will remain an important stride for the Wildcat women in their hopes for a good seeding in the Big Eight tournament, which starts Thursday, in Oklahoma City.

Last season the K-State netters handed the Buffalos a 6-3 setback at home, however, Bietau said Colorado is a very talented team.

"Colorado is a team that has had team played Brigham Young in some setbacks this year, but there are Provo, Utah. Bietau said the K-State two things to remember," Bietau some success in the past, and they have a lot of good players."

K-State is coming off a 5-4 victory over Oklahoma for the second year in a row, and only the second victory over Oklahoma for K-State in the history of the program.

"I am pleased with their performance last weekend, but I temper that with a little caution because it is not over yet," Bietau said. "We have some key matches to play, but it appears that our team is coming together and peaking at the right time.'

Peaking at the right time, Bietau said, leads him to believe that K-State is playing its best tennis of the season, and doing it at the right time with one match and then the tourney remaining. "The girls have worked awfully said. "They are a team that has had hard the last two weeks. I think we are starting to play our best tennis of the year," Bietau said. "What we do this weekend and what we do at the tournament remains to be seen."

> The play this weekend against Colorado will determine which seed in the conference the Wildcats will carry into the tourney.

The race for second through sixth is very tight and almost any team could hold down a spot, Bietau said.

"You can't compare other scores. They just don't mean anything," he said. "Oklahoma State is better than everyone else, but there is a very close race for second through sixth.

"If I would have to guess we would be fourth or fifth going into

Public can get sneak preview of gridders

By Scott Paske Sports Reporter

Pads are popping a lot more in spring football practice sessions this season. That's the way K-State coach Bill Snyder wants it.

"We tried to go into this spring with a different type of attitude, Snyder said. "One of our main goals was to develop a more physical football team, and a good portion of our youngsters have responded to that."

Wildcat fans can get a sneak preview of the second-year coach's newly implemented style, as the 'Cats will participate in a controlled scrimmage at 1:30 p.m. Saturday at KSU Stadium. The intrasquad session is the first of two times the public can view the 'Cats during spring practices. K-State concludes preseason workouts with the Varsity-Alumni contest April 28.

"It won't really be a game-type atmosphere like we will have next week," Snyder said. "There will be coaches out on the field teaching as we go along, and we'll run a lot of

Snyder said the scrimmage will have first-team units running plays against second-teamers, with several substitutions. That is a change from the way most of the spring workouts have run, he said.

situation-type offense and defense."

'We've been able to spend most of the spring working our ones-againstones, our first-team offense against the first-team defense," Snyder said. "With our number problems last year, that's something we weren't able to do a lot of.'

K-State's lack of depth has continued to be a concern for Snyder, but with 36 returning lettermen and 13 returning starters, practices have operated at a faster pace.

"The progress line has been jagged at times, but it is on a steady incline," Snyder said. "With several kids having experienced the system, there is a greater understanding of what it is all about.

"We wanted our spring workouts to be very competitive at every position, and for the most part, they have. There are still some areas where we just don't have the numbers, and it makes things tough at times."

Snyder said a way of overcoming that has been to increase the intensity of the workouts.

"It's become a more demanding type of practice environment," he said. "It wasn't really an intimidation factor from last season that determined this. We just wanted to get them to realize early what it takes to compete in a very tough Big Eight Conference.

'We weren't a very physical football team last year, and we needed to improve in that area."

Individuals who have impressed coaches in early workouts include fullback Eric Gallon, tight end Russ Campbell and newcomer offensive lineman Doug Grush. Snyder said Gallon, who netted 359 all-purpose yards in 1989, reported with an improved attitude.

"I'm happy with the work ethic he has displayed," Snyder said. "The talent has always been there, and now he is one of those who is accepting what we are trying to get across, and we've seen a lot of good things from him. Obviously, the confidence of being in the system has helped him." Campbell, a Wichita native, caught eight passes last season after

"This keeps us from having a boxer out there that could get someone killed," he said. "We have some skilled fighters, but if they stepped into Golden Gloves competition, they would find themselves out-classed."

Although anyone is allowed to compete, fighters are recruited from the fraternities and residence halls. Gilbert said the fraternity

Iowa State has won the last five meetings between the two schools, dating back to the final game of the 1988 series, a 24-20 Cyclone win in Manhattan.

In that contest, K-State's Bill Barnard had three homers and 10 RBIs.

In 1989, K-State dropped a pair of one-run games, a two-run contest, and a three-run decision in the series in Ames, Iowa.

Four wins for Iowa State, four tough defeats for K-State.

starter Alan Friedrich missed four games with an injury. The 6-foot-5, 245-pound Campbell entered the spring second on the preseason depth chart behind Al Jones.

"I feel good about the improvements Russ has made in all areas," Snyder said. "He is playing with a lot more assertiveness than he has displayed in the past.'

Grush, along with offensive lineman Casey Blim, transferred from American River Junior College in Sacramento, Calif. The 6-foot-3, 275-pound Grush was a member of the all-California juco team before coming to K-State at the beginning of this semester.

"We've made some progress within our entire offensive line," Snyder said. "For a transfer who is still learning the system, Doug is doing very well with it."

Snyder said his biggest surprise, as a group, has been the play of the secondary. After leading the nation in pass defense last season, K-State lost senior safeties Erick Harper and Marcus Miller, and cornerbacks Tyreese Herds and Dimitrie Scott.

"That was a big concern with the loss of several graduating seniors," Snyder said. "There really hasn't been one stand out more than the others, but I am as pleased with them as any other area on our football

K-State's quarterback position is still up for grabs. Carl Straw, who played in seven games last season and directed an 85-yard gamewinning drive against North Texas, came into spring drills No. 1 on the depth chart. Paul Watson, Chris Cobb, Matt Garber and redshirt freshman Jason Smargiasso are also competing.

"Right now, everybody is getting their reps," Snyder said. "We're not in a position where someone's jumped out way ahead of the others. Each of them have shown flashes of good things, and they've also had their bad moments.

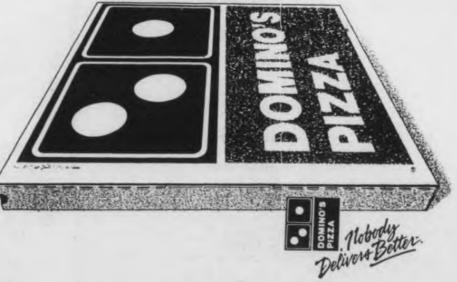

"Coming in, Carl was our No. 1, and right now I would say he still is, but he has not reached the level I think he's capable of. But nobody else has stepped up and looked better, either."

Speaker addresses minority involvement

By Ingrid Erickson Collegian Reporter

It is essential that minority members become more involved in all areas of the workforce, technology and the arts.

Social worker Esther Wolfe challenged her audience of students, faculty and administrators to use their strengths to become marketable through education.

Wolfe presented an informal discussion on issues facing blacks and Hispanics Thursday in the Union.

Her lecture was part of Hispanic Awareness Month.

There are four million Hispanic families in the United States, she said. They are a fast-growing minority, yet they must face some major issues that are common to all migrant Wolfe's lecture focused on the issues of education, economic development, and language as an necessity for business growth. She said all minorities must set an agenda to meet these issues.

"In the U.S., race is an issue on all public policy," she said.

In 1970, Americans of Spanish origin were recognized by the U.S. Census Bureau as a growing population and were labled "Hispanics." According to the Census Bureau, it was the first time this population was counted as a group.

Wolfe said this label created positive and negative results.

'It was good because it gave us identification, yet bad because there are very diverse people within this group," she said. "I try to direct the issue of diversity in this community.'

Wolfe gave the example of a man in New York who had to choose between being black or Hispanic on a census count.

"With over 22 million Hispanics in America the issue of race and ethnicity are a major part of Hispanic society."

Some members of the audience members expressed concern over the issue of education and retention of students throughout high school and college.

According to an updated 1980 census report, 8 percent of all Hispanics enrolled in U.S. universities complete a four-year institution program, Wolfe said. This figure is compared to a 20 percent graduation rate for non-Hispanics.

She said the major problem connected with the high drop-out rate among Hispanics is student isolation and lack of support.

The language barrier between English- and Spanish-speaking Americans is another factor in the advancement of Hispanics in the business world, Wolfe said. The issue of an all English-speaking country vs. a bilingual one is of growing concern to Hispanics.

Kidnappers postpone hostage release

Liberation of Palestine demands U.S. assistant secretary of state in Syria

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Pro-Iranian kidnappers said Thursday they postponed indefinitely the release of an American hostage because the United States refused to send a senior State Department official to Syria.

The Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine in a lengthy statement repeated its demand that John Kelly, U.S. assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, fly to

It also renewed threats to attack jetliners and airports used to transport thousands of Soviet Jewish emigrants to Israel. Much of the 500-word communique was devoted to the rise in Jewish emigrants, who Arab leaders say could strengthen Israel and displace Palestinians from the occupied territories.

In Damascus, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa said his government has been exerting a great deal of influence to secure the hostage release by Sunday. He would not of Robert Polhill, one of three U.S. elaborate.

President Bush said the United States has been disappointed before by dashed hopes for the release of American hostages and repeated that he will not meet the demands of kidnappers.

"The United States does not knuckle under to demands," said Bush when asked why he did not dispatch Kelly to Damascus.

The kidnappers' statement was accompanied by an instant photograph educators held by the group since Jan. 24, 1987. It was delivered to the Beirut newspaper an-Nahar and to a Western news agency

In a communique Wednesday, the group said Kelly should go to Damascus "to coordinate some final steps to guarantee success within 48 hours." They said a hostage would be freed within that time frame but did not say which one.

The U.S. Ambassador to Syria, Edward Djerjian, flew back to Damascus on Thursday. He and Kelly had been at a diplomatic meeting in West Germany.

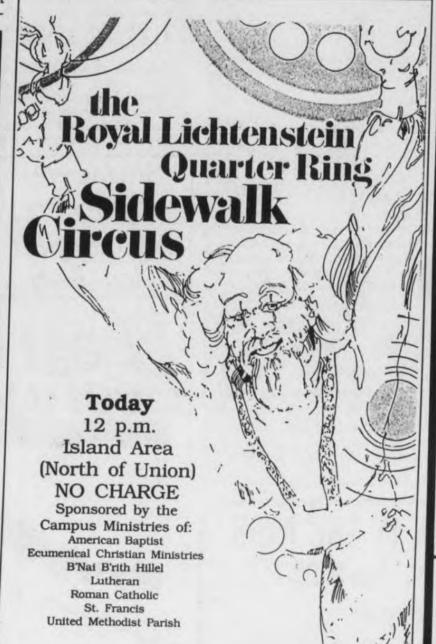

Djerjian held a series of meetings at Syria's Foreign Ministry. He did not speak to reporters.

Informed sources in Damascus. speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed the problem with the hostage-release centered on whether Kelly, the former U.S. ambassador to Lebanon, would go to Damascus.

The kidnappers had said Wednesday that a captive would be freed within 48 hours, or by Friday evening, in response to requests from Iran and Syria. Their leaders have encouraged an end to the hostage crisis. The group implied that some sort of exchange was involved.

That communique was accompanied by an instant photograph of Jesse Turner of Boise, Idaho, - the first photo of him alone since three months after his abduction. The group also holds Alann Steen.

Council proposes reserved stall increases, deleting unused permit requests, visitor fees

Staff Reporter

Public discussion on parking proposals will be heard at 3 p.m. today in the K-State Union Big 3

Proposals will include deleting visitor parking fees, refunding $10 or less for unused parking permit fees and increasing fees for reserved faculty and staff parking

The Council on Traffic, Parking and Police Operations will sponsor the parking hearing. Students, a city representative from the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, faculty and staff comprise the 16-member council.

John Lambert, director of public safety and member of the council, said most changes are made for economic reasons.

"Last year we paved all of the lots that were gravel, and we borrowed $3 million to do that," he said. "We need to increase fees in reserved stalls so we will have the money in our budget to pay back our debt. We also helped pave (Bramlage Coliseum's) lot. That's why there is a fee to park out there because we need the money to pay our debts." For the proposed changes to take place, the council makes recommendations on parking regulations to the administration. The administration approves or modifies the council's proposal, and then a public hearing is held so community members, students, staff and fa-

"We try to get the hearing sche-duled in late April so we can have the Regents discuss the changes in their May meeting," Lambert said. "We have to have them there and decided upon so the changes will

The proposed increase in reserved staff and faculty parking stalls reflects the demand for the stalls. Lambert said. Under the proposal, a 10-hour reserved stall will increase from $150 to $175. A 24-hour stall will increase from $225 to $265. Anyone with a re-served stall still has to purchase a parking permit.

Lambert said most people re-questing a reserved stall have their requests honored, but because space for the stalls is diminishing, their stalls may not be exactly where they want them.

"When people request a re-served stall, we have to put a post in the ground in front of that stall, and the space for such stalls is running out," Lambert said. "Some faculty members can voice their culty and staff members are given a stall that isn't as close as they would like."

Council Chairman Mike Finne-gan said he doubted that anyone would show up to protest the proposed increase in faculty and staff reserved stalls.

"It only increased $25," Finnegan said. "That's not enough to worry about. Look at all of its advantages.'

The council also proposed eli-minating refunds for unused parking permits for amounts of $10 or less. These refunds will be denied any faculty or staff member or

"The time and effort to process these reimbursements was costing us more than the requested refund," Lambert said.

"(This proposal) is not unrea-sonable," Finnegan said. "All sorts of things are contingent upon use. When you go to college you pay tuition, and if you quit after a month you get more of a refund than if you quit after two months.

Another proposed change is de-leting the $2 a day fee for visitors. Because there are too many entrances to cover and one control spot near the Union where visitors can obtain passes, the council felt it was best to delete the charge, Lam-

The council also proposed sev-eral changes made in the parking regulations for clarity purposes.

Blood chemistry profile, health screenings offered

By The Collegian Staff

Health-oriented students will be able to check their blood chemistry profile and other test results today and Saturday at Health Fair '90.

The fair in the Manhattan Town Center is sponsored by the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department, and will be from 7 a.m. to noon today, and 7 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday.

The blood chemistry profile will be offered both days from 7 a.m. to noon both days, said Joan Smith, Riley County Health Educator. The cost is $13 and participants must fast for 12 hours prior to the testing, she

The test will check for 26 different laboratory values which include cholesterol levels and other cardiac risk factors. Testing will be done by Peterson Clinical Labs of Manhattan.

There will be more than 45 exhibi-along with entertainment from students of the Sharon Washington Dance School and the Manhattan Gymnastics Club.

Information about health and environmental concerns, safety, and support groups will be made available, Smith said.

Robert Kraemer, professor of physical education, will offer exercise testing sessions which will measure cardiovascular fitness by using stationary bicycles.

The Riley County Emergency Medical Service will demonstrate the Heimlich maneuver, the American tors and screening stations at the fair, Heart Association will offer a lifestyle assessment and the Pawnee Mental Health Center will give stress management tips, Smith said.

Additional services offered free of charge include screenings for oral cancer, skin cancer, glaucoma, blood pressure, vision, and colon cancer.

"Last year we had over 1,600 people take the blood chemistry profile, and we're hoping even more will show up this year," Smith said. "We believe through wellness programs and by taking care of yourself you can get 100 percent out of your

Professor rates sex differences

By Stacle Sanders Collegian Reporter

Children are sexually biased when seeking help from a parental figure, said Mark Barnett, professor of psychology.

In a study titled "Perceived Gender Differences in Children's Helpseeking," Barnett presented 20 help situations to 213 second-, fourth- and sixth-graders at Manhattan public

Barnett said the students were asked to rate whether the child whose answers depended on their gender - would seek help from the mother or father.

A rating scale was developed for the children, Barnett said.

Christina Sinisi, graduate student in psychology, conducted the study in the classrooms. Assistants walked throughout the room to ensure that forms were filled out adequately, Barnett said.

On the scale, a rating of one indicated the unlikelihood of the child seeking help from the parent, Sinisi said, and a rating of five indicated the likelihood of help being sought.

"It was toughest for the young children to learn how to use the scale," Sinisi said.

Sinisi went through each question with the children and periodically checked to make sure all of the children were keeping up, she said.

The children rated each situation by circling a number under a picture of a mother's face and a father's face to gauge the probability of seeking help from that parent, she said.

In 17 of the 20 situations (the researchers) had a definite idea about who boys and who girls would go to with these particular situations," Barnett said. "The most simple explanation was that children saw certain kinds of help-seeking requirements met by mothers and certain help-seeking requirements met by

In some cases, the choices were related to the sex of the child, he said. Barnett had previously published a related study, "How do children see mothers and fathers helping?" In that study, instrumental and expressive helping was examined, Barnett said. It was found that children were biased, seeing fathers as action oriented and mothers as feelings Barnett said the help-seeking study seemed the natural next step. "I'm concerned that children may learn that males and females are re-

"I think that is not the most appropriate way to socialize our children," Barnett said. "I'd like to think that boys and girls can believe males and females can do almost anything, and that help giving is not necessarily associated with the sex of the help giver."

The study took about nine months to complete, including preliminary steps of getting consent from schools and obtaining parental permission,

"It's a time-consuming kind of effort to do this kind of research - but I think it's well worth it," Barnett

Results of the study are expected to be published in the Journal of General Psychology in the next six months, Barnett said.

As a tenant, Steve McKinzie, general manager of a local pest management firm, has a different perspective

"I think the property owner has the authority and the right to (use chemicals) to protect his property," he said. "But when we're (spraying apartments for bugs), we always coordinate that with the tenant."

McKinzie said his firm takes every possible measure to ensure the safety of everyone involved. He said spraying apartments to kill bugs usually involves only minimal risk because the chemicals used are tremendously diluted before they are applied.

"In most cases, there isn't any

Wedel said the term "household hazardous materials" is an umbrella term that describes toxic or potentially dangerous items, such as refinishing products, chemical cleaners, solvents and automotive fluids.

According to the Environmental Protection Agency, a substance is considered hazardous if it is corrosive, toxic or flammable. Substances are also considered hazardous if they are reactive or explosive when mixed with other substances.

Although many of these substances are inherently dangerous, they become even more threatening when disposed of improperly, Wedel said. The county landfill, for example, was not designed to hold these types of materials.

Household hazardous materials account for about 1 percent of the 110 tons of trash deposited in the landfill each day, Wedel said.

Hazardous substances people seldom use, but have stored in their homes also pose a threat to human safety and the environment, he said.

Although county officials plan to implement some type of year-round collection program, they would prefer residents take advantage of this opportunity, as opposed to disposing of these items later, Wedel said.

Time and budget constraints, however, have forced the county to limit the types of materials that will be accepted at the collection site, he said.

"This collection is just for household hazardous materials," Wedel said. "It is not for businesses, schools or commercial industries."

problem, but every case needs to be looked at individually," McKinzie

The severity of a problem must be considered when deciding whether to use chemical pest controls, he said.

"If you've got a severe roach problem, you might also have a severe health problem to be concerned about as well," McKinzie said.

However, if a landlord desires to use pesticides only as a preventative measure, as opposed to treating a real problem, tenants may have a legitimate reason to object, McKinzie

Mildred Lee, co-owner of a local apartment complex, said the owners don't spray for bugs unless the tenants request it.

She said she hires a contractor who sprays her complex for insect pests about three times a year.

Either she or her staff puts notices on the door of each apartment in the complex several days in advance of each spraying, Lee said. Tenants who do not want their apartment sprayed simply have to notify the management, she said.

In any case, the bottom line is quite

"If the landlord plays by the rules, there's usually not a problem. If not, he or she could be liable," said Dianne Urban, students' attorney. "Those are not easy questions to

However, the regents' original budget request to the Legislature included a enrollment adjustment based on a formula developed in 1981 and amended in 1987. This formula would reflect the large enrollment increase experienced by the University over the last three-year period, he said.

The conference committee adopted the 1992 enrollment adjustment after the House approved a bill with no enrollment increase, said Susan Peterson, legislative liasion for President Jon Wefald. The Senate had already passed an appropriations bill with the full enrollment adjustment.

Fairman said the administration is sensitive to the State's budget problems and has been in the past. The University accepted the 1983-84 rescision as well as the across the board cuts that were imposed on all regent institutions this year.

However, the $2.1 million enrollment adjustment reduction was projected as part of the University's base operating budget. The loss of this money means the University was cut twice, once in the across-the-board cuts and again with the enrollment adjustment.

Peterson said she believed the possibility still exists that the enrollment increase could be funded.

The conference committee could recommend greater funding or a funding amendment might be included in the omnibus funding bill at the end of the veto session, she said.

Peterson said there was a complacent attitude that the University would get the funding before the statement by Wefald last Wednesday. Wefald requested a letterwriting campaign to protest the cuts to the Legislature and Gov. Mike Hayden.

Since that request, she said, she believes there has been some movement in the Legislature.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said she has heard there is movement on the issue in the conference committee and is optimistic for funding increases in the enrollment adjustment.

have lower goals than others.
"It is difficult to raise funds for things like a library because people don't graduate in library science,' Morse said. "In other areas, alums give year after year, but here there is no pattern of giving.'

Morse and her husband, Richard, led the way in the University libraries campaign by donating $100,000. Moore said the Foundation, Alumni Association and administration work together to identify potential donors and cultivate a relationship with them.

"We work with individuals to figure out ways they can make gifts to the University," Moore said. "We really try to match an opportunity to give with a person's interests."

Moore said when people have a definite area of interest in the University, they tend to get into the habit of making donations.

"Generally, people want to give to positive things," Moore said.

The principal and lasting effect was to make environmental concerns a permanent part of the political dialogue in this country," he said.

"He was pushing for solar energy as a soft path for energy in the United States, against nuclear power," said Robel. "He was very intelligent and had long-range visions."

Earth Day was a result of the restless days of youth, Robel said. There was somewhat of an anti-war feeling and young people were looking for a cause. The environment gave a feeling of peace.

During the time of the first Earth Day, many environmental organizations were being formed on the K-State campus, Robel said. Dan

The Anderson Avenue fire department substation was recently closed due to construction on Anderson Avenue. Smith said only one engine was housed at the substation. Ladder and aerial trucks are stationed at the fire department headquarters.

Unit 1124-1126 received major damage to the roof, while other apartments appeared to have sustained smoke damage, Smith said. The firemen were forced to open the roof of unit 1126 to provide air circulation to the smoke-filled rooms. Wes Hastings, co-chairman of the disaster committee for the Riley County Chapter of the American Red Cross, said four families have received assistance from the Red with a funding problem. "We felt we put in enough safe guards," he said. "Personally, I don't think any of the departments can meet the criteria."

The board also heard the first reading of a proposal that would increase tuition $18 for resident students and $218 for out-of-state students.

The new tuition would be in effect for the fall of 1991, and create a six percent overall increase in tuition revenue.

The proposed three percent raise for resident students was the issue of some controversy.

Creighton said the committee decided on a small increase for resident students because their tuition has gone up the past four years in a row, and also because the state didn't fund their portion of the Margin of Excellence.

Regent Charles Hostetler said the increase might not even cover the cost of inflation, let alone any improvements in the universities.

"(The students) can't say we need more instructors and need our roofs fixed and also say we don't want to pay the same amount of 1991 dollars as 1990 dollars," he said. Andi Roberts, student body president of Emporia State University, said she defended the smaller rise because the levels of financial aid haven't increased at the same rate as tuition.

"Several campus organizations were involved especially in the recycling of aluminum cans," said Robel. One group filled the tennis courts that used to be located south of the Union with aluminum cans. "All the cans were later trucked to the Junction City landfill because there wasn't a market for them,"

Many activities are planned for the upcoming Earth Day on Sunday in City Park, McCulloh said. Booths will be set up to help people become aware of the things that can be done to help the environment.

"Earth Day one was very much a political movement," she said. Earth Day 20 is about individuals

QUESTION: Why did USD No. 383 purchase the old Manhattan Mutual building?

ANSWER: Contrary to some reports, the old Manhattan Mutual building was not purchased to house year-round classes. This property is adjacent to the current Middle School, and control of this property is essential to future needs of the existing school. Long-range plans call for the expansion to the east of the current Middle School. At this time there is a parking shortage for the Middle School faculty, and even more parking will be required after the remodeling. At present the Mutual building is being used for teacher meetings and "in-service" activities, and the plan is to use the building for some of the summer school classes.

American hostage released; 17 remain

By The Associated Press

DAMASCUS, Syria - A gaunt, pale Robert Polhill was freed Sunday by pro-Iranian Shiite Moslem militants in Beirut after 1,182 days as a hostage, and he said his anger kept him alive.

The Iranian foreign minister was quoted as saying the Shiite movements in Lebanon wanted a prompt reciprocal move for freeing Polhill, but President Bush said he would make no deals with the kidnappers.

Iran's foreign minister, Ali Akbar Velayati, was quoted early Monday as saying the pro-Iranian extremists in Lebanon wanted a quick reciprocal move. The official Syrian Arab News Agency, quoting Velayati in New York, specified the release of Sheik Abdul Karim Obeid, a Lebanese Shiite clergyman, abducted by Israeli soldiers in July.

In Iran, a newspaper close to Iranian President Hashemi Rafsanjani said Monday that the Lebanese kidnappers should release another American hostage immediately without conditions.

Polhill, 55, of New York, was freed near the seaside Summerland Hotel in Moslem west Beirut at 5:15 p.m. (10:15 a.m. CDT) and driven immediately to Damascus where he was turned over to U.S. Ambassador Edward Djerejian.

"I want to tell you I'm a very happy man tonight," Polhill told a news conference in Damascus, looking dazed but elated.

Early Monday, he and his Lebanese wife, Feryal, took off from the Syrian capital in a U.S. Air Force C-131 transport for Weisbaden, West Germany.

In Weisbaden, Polhill will undergo medical checks and a debriefing by U.S. intelligence officers at a U.S. military hospital. Other American captives freed in the past have also gone there. President Bush thanked Syria and Iran for their roles in freeing Polhill, and called for the release of all the hostages.

Seventeen Western hostages remain missing in Lebanon, including seven Americans. Polhill, a professor of business studies and accounting at Beirut University College, and two other U.S. educators, Jesse Turner and Alann Steen, were held by the Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine.

In a Syrian TV interview, Polhill said he was grateful to those who ■ See HOSTAGE, Page 16

About 60 people march down Massachusetts Avenue in Lawrence Saturday, capping off a week of speeches and activities for homosexual awareness. The six-block march ended in South Park, where the group participated in a rally and listened to speeches. Three K-State students marched, along with students from KU, WSU, Washburn and Kansas City.

K-State, KU, WSU activists attempt to raise awareness, attract government attention to homosexual equality, AIDS

LAWRENCE - "K-State and the Little Apple send their finest fruits" and "Gay K-Stater" read signs at a march for gay rights Saturday in Lawrence.

Three K-State students were inalved in the march along with students from the University of Kansas and Wichita State University. People also came from the Kansas City and Wichita chapters of the AIDS Coalition To Unleash Power.

KU's Gay and Lesbian Services of Kansas spent two months planning the march. It capped a week of speeches and other activities to raise consciousness about homosexuality, said Kim Windholz, march organizer and KU student.

"Our main goal is to bring AIDS to the attention of the government," Windholz said. "We want them to lower prices on AZT and to raise awareness on what AIDS is about." Before the march started, the men and women milled about, talking and comparing signs. "The general attitude is very happy and excited," Windholz said. 'Some are nervous.'

"Walking over here, I was going, 'Oh, wow, I'm really doing this,' said Chris, K-State junior in horticulture, who asked that his last name be withheld. "I've never marched before."

About 60 people began the block march down Massachusetts Street, but more joined along the way. By the time the marchers reached South Park for a rally, the number had grown to about 80.

"We're here, we're there, we're everywhere," the marchers chanted. Shoppers and store employees came out to their doorways to watch the march.

"Oh, god, they're fags," said a teen-aged boy watching from the sidewalk.

"I heard somebody say 'Go home,' but it really doesn't matter," said Jodell Chaney, KU employee. "(Homosexuality is) all around. We're not going away."

"Two, four, six, eight, gay is just as good as straight," the marchers

At the brief rally, speakers from GLSOK congratulated the marchers for showing their gay pride.

"Let's hear it for K-State they're louder than we are," Windholz yelled as the rally began.

Most of the speakers reinforced the idea that gay men and lesbians should stand up for their rights.

'Gay power is the power to do what we want to do, the same as heterosexuals, with no questions asked," said Henry Schwaller, GLSOK treasurer. "It means going to Wal-Mart with your arm around your lover if you want."

"We are battered daily by messages to become invisible, to squelch our passions, to pretend we don't count," said Liz Gowdy, KU graduate student and GLSOK member. She said the lack of homosexual rights represents the message society gives to gay men and

Campaign raises $52 million

Gordon Jump, Gov. Hayden speak to 800

By David Frese Collegian Reporter

Essential Edge National Campaign Committee Chairman Robert Hagans stood, spotlighted, center stage in a darkened Bramlage Coliseum with Master of Ceremonies Gordon Jump.

He had just announced to the crowd of more than 800 that campaign contributions had already amassed more than $52 million.

"Gordon," Hagan said, facing the actor, "$52 million is pretty exciting, and that's a real cause for celebration tonight. But you know what that means. We've still got to raise $48 million."

"Well, there are two things that I feel very good about," Jump said. "No. 1 is that you're at the helm of this. No. 2 is a thing I call the 'K-State spirit' that never leaves a job half done."

The $100 million campaign to give K-State the Essential Edge in the coming century officially kicked off Saturday evening in Bramlage Coliseum with an elegant black-tie celebration.

Hagans was applauded by the more than 800 people attending as he announced contributions to date art museum.

Test wells reveal contamination at University site

By Bryan Ackley Science Reporter

Chemicals deposited in the landfill at the University's hazardous waste disposal site have contaminated the groundwater under the site, University officials said. For the moment, however, no public or private water supplies are in danger of being contaminated, said John Lambert, director of the K-State Department of Public Safety.

"We believe the levels (of contamination) aren't high enough to cause any real problem," Lambert said.

In January, K-State geologists drilled five test wells at the site, located a few hundred feet north of KSU Stadium, to see if chemicals or other hazardous materials buried in the landfill had contaminated adjacent groundwater.

According to a news release issued Thursday, the test results showed that minute concentrations of 10 chemical contaminants - primarily components of various solvents have been found in the groundwater under the site.

Campus safety officials are confident the contamination has not spread beyond the boundaries of the site, Lambert said.

If the contamination does spread, a test well located near the eastern boundary of the site will indicate it because the groundwater below the site flows to the east, he said.

Jack Oviatt, assistant professor of geology, said in January if the groundwater under the landfill was found to be contaminated, it would move away from the site so slowly it would take thousands of years to reach and infiltrate Manhattan's water supply.

The contamination, however, had yet to be discovered when Oviatt made that statement.

In recent weeks, University geologists have become increasingly reluctant to talk with the media about

Eric Nold, graduate student in geology, said K-State officials, citing University policy, have instructed him and others in the Department of Geology not to comment to the media about any aspect of the campus landfill situation.

Nold, who was involved in the drilling of the test wells in January, said these instructions were issued primarily because University policy prohibits K-State geologists from speaking about this matter on behalf of the University.

They (University officials) told us not to say anything due to the legalities involved," he said.

Soviets deny Baltic blockade

VILNIUS, U.S.S.R. (AP) - An official from Moscow said Sunday the Lithuanian independence movement is leading the republic to catastrophe and he denied that the Kremlin has imposed a total economic blockade.

Andrei Girenko, a secretary of the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee, said Sunday that Lithuania's declaration of independence March 11 meant building new economic relationships resulting in higher prices.

He denied Moscow had imposed a total economic boycott, saying that only oil and natural gas were affected.

The Soviet decision to cut off all of Lithuania's oil supply and nearly all of its natural gas is expected to put 70 percent of the republic's work force out of work.

The Sajudis independence movement, whose leaders dominate Lithuania's government, declared its determination to stand by the declaration of independence.

In neighboring Latvia, meanwhile, the drive for independence received a show of support in a rally attended by 9,000 newly elected members of city councils, regional bodies and the republic's parliament, a journalist reported.

The streets of Vilnius, the Lithuanian capital, were calm, with people walking rather than using cars as they coped with stringent gasoline rationing that permits about 7 gallons per month for private cars.

Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia are all trying to restore the independence they lost in 1940 when they were occupied and forcibly annexed to the Soviet Union. Lithuania has declared independence, Estonia has dropped enforcement of the Soviet Constitution, and Latvia is expected to declare its freedom from the Soviet Union on May 3.

Execution footage televised

PARIS (AP) - Romanian dictator Nicolae Ceausescu wept silently and his wife Elena begged for mercy as soldiers readied them for the firing squad, according to footage of their execution broadcast Sunday.

Extracts of the graphic 90-minute videotape were aired exclusively by the French television network TF1. They are the most detailed look yet at the execution Dec. 25 at a military base outside Bucharest. The Ceausescus were executed days after being toppled by a popular revolution.

'Don't attack us! We have the right to die the way we want," Elena Ceausescu told soldiers and the 10-person civilian-military tribunal that sentenced the couple to death. "Children ..." she sniffed at the soldiers who tied her hands behind her back. "You are bruising my hands. This is shameful. Why, why? I raised you all like a mother." Nicolae Ceausescu, who ruled Romania with an iron fist for a quarter-century, struggled briefly with the soldiers but said nothing. Tears rolled down his cheeks.

Millions celebrate Earth Day

(AP) - Millions of Americans cleaned up beaches and roadsides, planted trees and listened to music with a message as they celebrated the 20th anniversary of Earth Day, the "environmental teach-in" that launched a movement.

In all, about 3,600 American cities and towns mustered forces to rejuvenate the environmental movement that was launched by the original Earth Day in 1970.

"I get a real sense of a renewal, and a kind of rededication, that will provide the support for change at the grass-roots level," said John McLachlan, scientific director at the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences in Research Triangle Park, N.C. "There's a sense of urgency that hasn't been there." Thousands watched a hot-air balloon - decorated as the Earth - rise in New York's Times Square where the ball falls on New Year's Eve. The Environmental Protection Agency unveiled a fleet of cars and trucks powered by alcohol, natural gas and electricity in Ann Arbor, Mich.

Students at Susquehanna University in Pennsylvania buried a paper mache "Old Earth" containing a plastic foam cup, aerosol can, disposable diaper and container of leaded gasoline.

At a gathering of 125,000 people at the U.S. Capitol in Washington, several activists criticized President Bush for spending the weekend fishing in Florida.

President Bush took a break from his fishing trip in the Florida Keys to give what he calls a "point of light" award to the citizens group Reef Relief, which is working to save the coral reef flanking the Keys.

Author discusses drug charges

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) - Author Hunter S. Thompson, sporting a green baseball cap emblazoned with a badge, bemoaned his legal problems and said he is crusading against improper police power.

"I'm a kind of fugitive from justice," Thompson said in a 30-minute speech at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

"I've been anointed as the point man to carry the ball for a lot of people in the country who thought the police didn't have a right to come search your home on the word of any informant," he said.

Thompson faces felony charges in Colorado of possession of cocaine, LSD, valium, marijuana, dynamite and blasting caps. In a separate case, Thompson faces a felony charge of using cocaine and misdemeanor charges of third-degree sexual assault and third-degree assault.

Thompson sipped bourbon and smoked cigarettes from a holder throughout the disjointed address Friday night.

Marchers protest assault

WICHITA (AP) - About 150 women and men marched near Wichita State University's campus this weekend to draw attention to the problem of sexual assault.

Among the marchers Saturday was Karen Graham, 24, who wore short-cut skirts and a tight halter top and had a cardboard sign strapped to her back reading, "I'm not asking for it." "At a certain point, you can arrest me for indecent exposure," Graham said. "But you can't rape me." She said the case last year of a woman whose clothing style was held against her in a Florida rape trial, and whose alleged attacker was acquitted, made her angry. "That, along with what I hear at bars, and hear even from my relatives: 'Oh, what was she wearing? She was asking for it by being at that park, or that party," she said. "It kind of offends me that I should have to come out here and do this." This year's half-hour "Take Back the Night" march was the third annual march organized by the Wichita Area Sexual Assault Center. The march also marked the start of National Victims Rights Week activities in Wichita. Among the marchers were several victims of sexual assaults who said they hoped their experiences would help others realize they were neither alone with their suffering nor to blame for the crimes committed against them.

"It's been three years since I started dealing with the problem," said Sherry Fallis, whose arthritis forced her to march on crutches. "We need to bring awareness to the whole thing, to let them know that there are places to get help."

Senate passes late sanction

By Kirk Caraway Staff Reporter

Student Senate decided to impose a 15 percent late penalty against Black Student Union and KSU Rodeo Club Thursday night before approving the entire tentative allocation bill totaling $230,481.74.

The controversy over funding groups that missed the deadline for budget requests began April 5 when Senate allocated $1,643.90 to BSU, despite intense debate on the request being two weeks late.

"It's not an issue of whether they deserve money or not, it's an issue of precedent," said Sean Cash, arts and sciences senator and sponsor of the amendment to cut BSU and Rodeo Club. "I think a 15 percent cut will discourage other groups from coming in late."

The vote on whether to cut the groups was delayed in an unsuccessful attempt to contact representatives from BSU to have them attend the meeting.

"It's unfair that we are debating this when they're not represented here tonight," said Brooke Jones, arts and sciences senator. "I can't believe we're even considering this."

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, expressed concern that the amendment was made at that time and didn't follow the appeals process. Informal guidelines were set up before the start of the allocations process that called for any appeals to be submitted in writing by April 16.

"We set (the appeals deadline) so that we could inform groups that we were going to be dealing with them," Routson said. "I think it is very arrogant and rude what is going on here

"We need to set this precedent, regardless of whether they're here or not," said Dave McConnell, architecture senator.

Before the debate began on the 15 percent cut, the Rodeo Club budget of $635.20 was added to the allocations bill. The group came forward with its budget after Senate approved BSU's late request.

"We need to be consistent," said Barry Beck, coordinator of finances. "BSU and Rodeo club had identical reasons for being late.'

Senator criticizes Collegian coverage

By Kirk Caraway

The press is not treating Student Senate fairly and a change in Student Publications Inc. funding should be considered to influence the Collegian's coverage, said Engineering Senator Todd Giefer.

During remarks made in Senate's informal period Thursday night, Giefer expressed his outrage at the Collegian's coverage of Senate in the past few weeks, especially the articles dealing with the funding of Black Student Union.

"I'm irate that our nationallyrespected student publication is printing only one side of the story," Giefer said. "All they are doing is printing this to try to create some controversy on campus.

They have not respected Student Senate. Maybe if a monetary change in their funding occurred, they would really look at what the heck they're doing," Giefer said.

"Maybe if the students' views, all the students' views, aren't expressed, we should seriously think about how we're funding them," he said.

Giefer said Senate should look at cutting back some of the funding for Student Publications when it comes up for review this year.

"We can change it (Student Publications funding) this year," he said. "To change, to look at the Collegian's ethics. To me, they have not been acting ethical in the last two

Go beyond 'environmental trendiness'

esterday was Earth Day. Celebrities from all over came out for the cause. There was a network special, a Geraldo show and much more. Here at home, people walked the Konza Prairie and there were newspaper drop-off points at Manhattan Town Center all day. Kansas Organic Producers sponsored an agricultural fair and food booth.

Today is the start of Earth Week - or rather a continuation of "Earth Fortnight." UFM classes, SAVE lectures and poetry readings will allow people to become informed. These two weeks are great moments in human history ...

And then it's over.

Come Monday, April 30, people will (don't deny it) go back to throwing beer cans away or worse, out the car window. Disposable diapers and Styrofoam will cease to be noticed. Sweaty athletes will quit using messy cream and go back to spraying convenient aerosol anti-fungal stuff on their bodies. The precious few recycling bins on campus may linger for a few days or weeks, but those will also disappear.

Geraldo, Oprah and Donahue will cease their environment campaigns and again feature nymphomaniacal, drugged-out, mutant spouse-beaters who perform sacrilegious rights involving raw sewage.

The Earth activities these two weeks are too concentrated in time to make any difference. The passion and fury people are showing are nothing but a trend. In this isolated second of human history it is hip to be environmentally concerned. That being the case, it is time for a challenge.

A friend of mine - an environmental law student — put the challenge into perfect words: "Go beyond the trendiness of environmentalism.

we have to do is do, and the mission will be a success. Oh, look. A tape recorder under this "Your mission, should you choose to accept it, is to keep environmental concerns in your minds at all times. This does not mean going to the same extremes as Greenpeace, but it does mean doing what you can, always. "On the other hand, should you choose not to accept the mission, all record of your existence will be erased. No intelligent being will acknowlege your instant on Earth because it will be too embarassing. This Earth will self destruct within the century, that is all.

Enough prophecy. There are at least two things we can do - as locally as Manhattan, and as globally as, well, you know the rest. The activities are so small and easy that taken

This is kind of like Mission Possible. All alone they don't seem to help much. But if they were used we would be a lot closer to a healthy Earth.

The most obvious thing is to make recycling containers around town as common as trash receptacles and mailboxes. Whenever I finish drinking a can of pop or reading the newspaper, I think to myself, "I should recycle this." But when I realize that that would require an all-out recycling quest, I just throw whatever it is away.

In city parks, on campus and in the 'Ville, simple trash cans could easily be replaced with a group of four, clearly labeled recycling containers: paper, alumninum, glass and Styrofoam.

The cluster would not take much more room than the trash barrel and could be made to look just as nice. Actually, the recycling they are not meant to be thrown away. The cluster would have to be as nice-looking and permanent as current trash cans for people to take them seriously. I hate those cardboard recycling boxes that lie in dark corners of buildings. The boxes are hard to find, you wonder if they aren't really the contents of someone's file cabinet and they look like they are only there to appease environmentalists.

ecycling is good, but one of the best ways of dealing with trash is to cut it off at the source. The Union food service uses incredible numbers of Styrofoam cups each week. Granted, the Union Styrofoam does not contain CFC's, but Styrofoam is a plastic, so it doesn't degrade rapidly. Styrofoam, no matter how friendly it may be to the atmosphere, chokes landfills.

One solution to the Styrofoam problem is to replace all Styrofoam cups with paper cups. It probably is possible to make a double-walled paper coffee cup that would keep the hot side hot and the cool side cool. So why not switch to paper?

Because that uses trees.

A better solution is to do away with disposable cups entirely. Refillable Wild Willie mugs, available in the Union, can completely replace cups. The mugs are plastic, but then mugs are more expensive at the outset, but it is cheaper to refill a large Willie mug than to buy large drinks in Styrofoam.

A 34-ounce Willie mug costs $2.75. The buyer gets a free fill with the purchase of a mug and refills are only 50 cents. On the other hand, a 32-ounce, Styrofoam-cupped drink costs 95 cents each time one is purchased.

A little math shows that by the fifth refreshing Diet Coke the Willie-mugger has broken even with the Styrofoamer, and every subsequent refill saves the Willie-mugger 45 cents. That doesn't even count the fact that large Willie mugs hold more than large Styr-

Visitors to the University can use glassware when they eat in the Union. If they want a soft drink to go, they probably wouldn't mind keeping a Willie mug as a souvenir. The University gives away free K-State bumperstickers, note pads and other paraphanalia to its prospective students and family ... why not a coupon for a free Willie mug?

These are only two suggestions, and they may not be the best ones. But they would be a definite step toward continued consciousness of the environment. Earth day is too shortlived to make a difference and it has been made so popular it's meaningless. Go beyond the trendiness of environmentalism - just keep it in mind. It doesn't take much.

Wording of decision infringes upon freedom

Just as restrictions seem to be easing in the Communist Bloc, the United States is seeing some frightening action in the Supreme Court.

Last July, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a Missouri law restricting abortion, which gives great power to states to individually decide the legality of abortion.

Last week, the Supreme Court upheld an Ohio law that makes it a crime to possess child pornography.

Big Brother is breathing down

The most alarming aspect of the newest legislative decision is the vagueness of its wording. Although it bars possession only where "nudity constitutes a lewd exhibition or involves a graphic focus on the genitals," this could apply to many photographs and works of art that most would not consider vulgar.

ADVERTISING MANAGEN

GRAPHIC ARTISTS

MARKETING/PROMOTIONS MANAGER

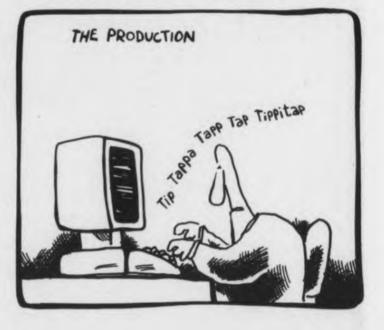

ADVERTISING REPRESENTATIVES/ACCOUNT EXECUTIVES.

Justice William Brennan Jr., one of three justices who opposed the decision, said artworks, including Michelangelo's statue "David," could be judged to have a graphic focus on the genitals. Even depictions of nude children on friezes in the Supreme Court's own courtroom could be described as lewd.

Granted, no one can argue that child pornography should be legal -the subjects are below the age of consent. The ban of possession of such material is designed to dry up the market for it.

The intent of the Supreme Court's decision is worthy of praise, and anything that can be done to put an end to the exploitation and abuse of children is laudable. However, any time a law begins to limit freedom of speech and dictate decency, the basic pillars of our democracy are threatened.

Memo discourages truth pring is a time of rebirth. I hope this is equally true for the University's budget. I have been watching this exciting budget session with great interest. Graduate teaching assistants in the department of English must learn to deal with the ambiguity, the illusions and the mystery of life, so I don't take personally the financial difficulties of Kansas. I just work with a safety net: I take out student loans.(I suggest all assistants consider alternate funds for fall.)

Dan Golder Ronnie Metz ... Johan Koel

Paul Heier, Leah Leverich, Monique Scroggins,

What has been interesting to me, though, is the way the increasingly insufficient budget has affected the control I have over my composition classes. In the three years I have been here, I have watched the size of my classes raise from 17 to 22, and possibly to 25 this fall. This is almost double the capacity recommended by current research. In addition, this year the department of English didn't have enough money to photocopy support material for the composition courses. We were allowed, however, to photocopy "essential" materials, though the definition of "essential" has seemed to narrow and narrow.

Then, on Friday, I experienced the ultimate intrusion - the ultimate piece of propaganda. In my mailbox was a memo to all faculty from John Fairman, Director of Information for the University, and Provost Jim Coffman "requesting" us to respond with an official statement, provided in the memo, to student inquiries regarding unavailable classes. This two sentence memo has infuriated me more than any good episode of Geraldo. The memo smacks of the ignorance of human phones would have to be removed from fa-entire memo in its dubious glamour: "We are requesting that when or if students ask about classes that are not available you respond that at present we do not have the staff for these particular sections. Please do not say that it is because of budget cuts as behavior, or political ineptitude, and, what's worse for me, of bad rhetoric. I include the the Legislature has not made a final decision on the budget."

To begin, let's look at the facts. Out of all the composition sections offered this fall, 19 have a maximum capacity of zero. That's right, zero. This way, should the money become available over the summer, the enrollment number can be raised from zero to possibly 25. Contrary to the memo, we do have the staff for these sections. We have plenty of

If the staff is available, as it is in the department of English, then the memo asks us to lie to our students. The memo suggests that a lack of staff is the problem. Nonsense. We have the staff, but to keep it, we need money. The money comes from the Legislature. Why not tell our students the truth? Hey, we may or may not get the money we need. Therefore, we may have to let go of some staff as well as the classes the students need in order to graduate. It's as simple as that. Staff and students are mature adults capable of understanding plain truth. Don't sugar coat it for us. We have the staff, we don't yet have the money. This means that staff and courses may have to here are other reasons why I was provoked by the memo. First, Fairman and Coffman have failed to foresee the most likely response to their memo. Most professors, instructors and assistants are independently minded - that's why they teach here. Therefore, their reaction will certainly be to draw their students' attention to the issue and probably even to the memo. The intent of the memo may have been to mitigate the volatile feelings concerning the possible budget cuts; however, by drawing attention to the issue by sending such a provoking memo to thousands of staff, they only up the emotional ante of all concerned.

Second, Coffman and Fairman present themselves as overreacting, overly protective fathers of the faculty, staff and students. The same day I received their memo an article reporting the upcoming class walk-out appeared in the Collegian. This made it clear to me that K-State students are damn well aware of the problems concerning the budget: that they may not get the classes they want; that the classes they do get will be crowded; and that they don't need sugar-coated memos from "fathers" hiding the all-too-real possibility of under-funding. Some people just can't let students (or staff) think for

Do Fairman and Coffman think that without student awareness and pressure, the Legislature will be more likely to allocate funds? Are we as a staff to teach meekly along, watching the University "understaff" itself to the grave? Should we tell our students, "close your eyes. It will all go away?" (Perhaps we shouldn't blame Fairman, after all, he is Director of Information for the University - the corporate University, not the students I'm sure).

We have plenty of staff. We need money. There's nothing new about that. If teachers and college students can understand anything it's that we need more money. Really, we should tell our students not to count on their classes, or their educations, and we should tell the staff not to count on their jobs. More importantly, the administration should leave us alone to teach and to learn and to pressure. Bonne chance K-State.

Hikers assemble, walk Konza Prairie in foggy Sunday dawn

By Melissa Simpson Staff Reporter

At 6 a.m. sharp, hikers assembled in the near darkness of the Flint said. Hills to relish the moods of the Konza Prairie at dawn.

Many of the almost 70 Konza Prairie Dawn Walk hikers commented on how peaceful the atmosphere surrounding them was, compared to the unappealing, hectic manner of life in the city on any given day. They enjoyed listening to the sounds of nature during their stroll, and the hikers seldom spoke to one another for fear of ruining the pleasant moment that celebrated the beginning of Earth Day 1990

"At this time in the morning, no one usually realizes or thinks about brush smoldering.

the Earth, and just this walk will make me think about the Earth and its beauty more often," one hiker

The darkness disappeared slowly, and fog settled across the prairie for the length of the entire walk. Shadows of brush, a few trees and grass could be seen if one looked close enough, but the shadows were hard to find in parts of the prairie that had been burned by roaring spring fires.

Some argued that the fires were to improve the looks of the prairie, and after several rains the grass would be green. Others said the future growth of grass and flowers could be harmed. Everyone could smell the remaining ashes of grass and

Gary Merrill, associate coordinator of the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area and organizer of the Dawn Walk, led the hikers throughout the hour-long journey.

"More people than expected showed up, and it's a good thing we didn't call it a sunrise walk because the fog ruined that," Merrill said. "But I think it was a wonderful way to start Earth Day."

"Since it was Earth Day, we thought a dawn walk would be neat to have," Karen McCulloh, Earth Day coordinator, said. "A high point of the walk is looking out over the highest point along the trail and watching the sun rise. We just thought it would be nice to enjoy

More than 200 car loads of people unloaded various household chemicals at the Home Hazardous Waste Pick-up at CiCo Park. The chemicals were loaded onto trucks for proper treatment and disposal.

Ways to recycle aluminum, plastics, glass and paper, along with ways to save and protect the environment were the topics and issues of Flint Hills Earth Day

People of all ages gathered in the Manhattan City Park Sunday afternoon to hear folk and rock music, observe environmental displays and unload their recyclable products.

Outside the park pavilion, the Riley County Humane Society allowed dogs to roam in small penned areas so observers could pet and admire them. Humane Society members stressed to the observers the need for adoptive caretakers for cats, dogs and other pets that have been abandoned by their previous owners. Can-Man Recycling weighed aluminum, paper, plastic and glass from those who had bagged their recyclable products, and CEN-KAN, a trash and recycling service, was on hand to haul

Dale Smith, owner of CEN-KAN, said his service is trying to move all recyclable products out of the city limits. The service ships recyclable glass to Oklahoma, where it is processed into glass bottles, and plastic to Iowa.

"We charge $27.50 to pick up recyclable products on a weekly basis for three months," Smith said. "The customers have to sign an agreement that states they will separate their recyclables from the rest of their household trash."

The agreement also allows the customers reduced trash pick-up rates for sorting their items. "Our buggy follows behind the trash truck, and we pick up the recyclable goods and then sort them by plastic, glass, paper and aluminum piles," Smith said. "Then we ship or haul them to the places we have contracts with."

Throughout the day, about 200 people listened to musical performers sing about saving and protecting the environment. Listeners soaked in the sun's rays as they lounged on the grass or blankets, while bands such as No Pun Intended and The Moving Van Goghs performed.

"It really means a lot that these local bands took time to perform for Earth Day," said Wendy Mannen, a member of Students Acting to Save a Vulnerable Environment. "It's nice that Manhattan could take part in the national celebration and localize it by having these bands perform. Provost James Coffman addressed the crowd around 2 p.m., and commended the organizers of Earth Day.

Wildcats drop series to Iowa State

lowa State second baseman Virgil Fulk awaited the arrival of K-State designated hitter Brian Culp Sunday during a stolen base attempt ...

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

On a Sunday that saw the National Football League conduct its annual draft of college talent, two college baseball teams hooked up in a contest that ended with a score that more closely resembled a football result.

Those two teams — Iowa State and K-State — traded big innings, with the Cyclones putting together more of them. The outcome was a 16-9 Iowa State win at Frank Myers Field.

Coupled with a Cyclone sweep of Saturday night's doubleheader, Iowa State took three-of-four games in the series, handing the Wildcats their first Big Eight series defeat of

K-State, however, remained in second place in the Big Eight with a 10-6 conference mark, a .625 winning percentage. Iowa State, 7-5 in loop play through just three Big Eight series, sports a .583 winning percentage.

K-State is 23-17 overall, Iowa State 22-14.

The Sunday game had neither Iowa State coach Bobby Randall nor K-State coach Mike Clark pleased.

"I thought this game was the worst we played of the three we won," said Randall, a former all-Big Eight shortstop for K-State. "Surprisingly enough, the one we lost was the one game we played the best

"Today's game was just one of those games you dread," Clark said, shaking his head. "It was Murphy's law. Whatever could go wrong,

And things went wrong more often than not Sunday for K-State. Iowa State had three separate four-run innings and a three-run frame en route to pounding out 20 hits off five different K-State

"When you let a team have a four spot (four-run inning), it's terrible,' Clark said. "When you do it more than once, you're in trouble."

In addition to the woes for the Wildcats on the mound, K-State committed five errors in the field.

"We've just got to get our pitching back in order and play some solid defense again," Clark said. "We just didn't execute off the mound worth a hill of beans."

Tom Vantiger had three doubles, two runs scored and two RBIs to pace the Cyclone attack. Starter Mike Myers, 1-2, got the win with relief help from three additional pitchers. Myers had a no-hitter until the fourth, when K-State broke through for its first runs of the contest.

Kent Hipp, 5-3, took the loss for K-State.

Saturday's Doubleheader Iowa State took both games of the twinbill, the first by a 14-3 count and the second by a 5-4 score. In the opening game, Iowa State had two five-run innings and rode homers by Mike Busch and Mike Weimerskirch to the win.

Eps, ATOs dominate

By Scott Paske Sports Reporter

Alpha Tau Omega and host Sigma Phi Epsilon dominated the final round of competition at the 11th Annual Fite Nite Sunday at Weber

The ATOs captured the team title in the three-day event as four boxers qualified for championship bouts, but none were able to capture titles. The Sig Eps also sent four into the title round, with three emerging as champions.

Sig Ep Tom Shortt posted the evening's fastest knockout, while teammate Steve Neusteadter won a decision in one of the best title fights.

Shortt hit Haymaker Hall's Blaine Domann with a left to the stomach 55 seconds into their middleweight bout. Domann fell to the canvas and arose to accept a standing-eight count, but slumped back down after appearing to have the wind knocked out of him.

Shortt's victory was one of three knockouts of the evening.

Neusteadter, who lost a narrow decision to Sigma Nu's Prestin Underwood last year, captured one Sunday. In the light middleweight championship, Neusteadter and ATO Dean tured the evening's other knockout in Robbins stood toe-to-toe for the entire fight.

The Sig Ep used a height and reach advantage to score in the first round. But Robbins changed his strategy in the final two rounds, charging inside and locking up Neusteadter's arms. Robbins' technique was effective, but the judges awarded Neusteadter the victory.

Ryan Shay won the third Sig Ep title, taking a decision from Curtis Raines of Alpha Gamma Rho.

Shawn Kitchen of Alpha Kappa Lambda and Mark Whitson of Kappa Sigma won the praise of the crowd in their lightweight title fight. The two traded furious punching rallies throughout the fight, then Kitchen landed a pair of left hooks in the final seconds of the fight. He was awarded a narrow decision.

Sophomore Tony Williams, an offensive tackle on the K-State football team, won the heavyweight title over ATO Ken Jensen. The 6-foot-4, 295-pounder unleashed a flurry of second-round punches, chasing Jensen into a corner before delivering the final punch.

'I was in control all of the way thorugh," Schildknecht said. "I feel very good going into the Big coach Steve Bietau said. "Color- Eight Tournament. I think I have chance if I stay focused."

In K-State's other singles matches, at No. 1 Marijke Nel defeated Birgit Fink-Jensen, 6-3, 3-6, 6-4; Sara Hancock lost to Wendi

Caplan, 7-6, 6-3; Valerie Rive lost to Kelly Hansen, 6-2, 6-2; Thresa Burcham defeated Elke Schaumberg, 1-6, 7-6, 6-3; and Suzanne Sim defeated Amy Marks, 5-7, 6-0,

In doubles, K-State swept through easily in straight sets, with one going to a tie-breaker.

Curtis Raines, Alpha Gamma Rho, jabs the nose of Ryan Shay, Sigma Phi Epsilon, during a featherweight bout at Fite Nite Sunday.

Pat Steiner, Sigma Nu, takes a punch from Travis McKinzie, FarmHouse, during Sigma Phi Epsilon Fite Nite Sunday in Weber Arena. Steiner won the match. Sunday was the championship round of Fite Nite in which nine champions were crowned.

Miller paces K-State performances

By Dan Wicker Sports Reporter

K-State's Angie Miller stole the show at the 65th Kansas Relays during the past weekend, sweeping both of the throwing events she entered at Memorial Stadium.

The all-American Miller from Frankfort captured first place in both the shot put and discus, with throws of 50-10 and 163-5 respectively, and she was named the KU Relays Outstanding Performer for

"But I'm kind of disappointed," Miller said of her performance, which was more than a foot shorter than her season-best toss of 164-7. "I would have liked to have thrown around the (NCAA) qualifying mark (172-3). It seems like I've been stuck on 163 for so long."

Last year, placing second in the discus at KU, Miller did qualify for nationals, but she still has three meets in which to take aim on the national qualifying standard. She has already qualified for the NCAA meet in the shot put.

Miller will be going into the Big Eight Championships, May 19 through 21, as the defending outdoor champion in the discus, while she finished second in the shot last year at Lincoln, Neb. She also won this past Big Eight season's indoor K-State assistant coach Jesse Stuart said prior to the KU Relays that he thought Miller was on the verge of qualifying in the discus sometime soon.

Elsewhere for K-State, it was not exactly how Coach John Capriotti wanted distance aces Angie Barry and Janet Haskin to run the 5,000 meter race at the 65th annual Kansas Relays Saturday, but he did not mind once he saw the final outcome. Haskin and Barry executed the race just how they wanted to by holding the two lead positions from start to finish en route to their sweep of the top two spots.

"Not really (lead the entire race), but they wanted to so I let them,' Capriotti said. They took control and ran a real smart race."

When the two training partners came to the line to start the race, they said they knew they had competition between themselves, and as they looked down the large pack they knew they had to begin the race with a bang.

'We wanted to go out and lead the whole way. We looked down the pack and said 'We are getting out of here," Barry said. "We don't really worry about other competition. We know we have competition within

"It's about what we wanted. It was like a tempo," Haskin said. "We were telling each other to go out and run the last mile and that we would still be friends in the end."

And in the end, Haskin was crowned the relays' 5,000-meter champion, but not before she had to use a surprising last 100 meter kick to overtake Barry before the tape.

"I've never really had that much speed. I really just wanted to stay with her," Haskin said. "At the 100 I was just going to give it my all."

The men's side was not without their shining performances at the relays either. The men's two-mile relay team of Jared Storm, Randy Helling, Jason Goertzen and Marcus Wright captured a gold medal and set a personal best by five seconds after battling the whole race with arch-rival Kansas.

K-State trailed Kansas for the entire race until Goertzen dusted Kansas' third leg with a kick and handed the baton to Wright, who held the little hard, but they were able to hang on. I think in a race like that it is more important to win," Capriotti said. "We were behind in almost every leg. After we finally got the lead I couldn't see anyone catching Marcus."

"We knew we were in the top two. It was just the idea of getting it done," Wright said. "This has set our goals because we are all so young. We will have everyone back next year."

The men also got a long awaited performance from high jumper R.D. Cogswell who placed second with a leap of 7-1. Cogswell, who has been battling sickness, took a few practice days off to rest for KU and it obviously paid off.

"My goal was to jump 7-0. The last time I jumped seven feet was my senior (high school) year at this meet," said Cogswell, a Topeka-Seaman product. "It's about time we got blessed with good weather. I was finally healthy and came up with a good jump.'

Other first-place performers were Clifton Etheridge, who repeated as the relays long-jump champion, and Scott Merril, who won the developmental pole vault.

The meet was an overall success for his K-State team said Capriotti. "I'm really pleased. We've had a good meet," he said.

K-State's R.D. Cogswell had his best outing since his high school days at Topeka-Seaman Saturday, placing second at KU.

Debbie Schmidt, a sophomore from Hanover, threw her way to a fifth-place finish in the javelin at the Kansas Relays Saturday with a toss of 145-4. Coach John Capriotti said his squad had "a good meet."

Big 8 golf opens

By Chris Hays Sports Editor

In a warm-up meet to get them-selves prepared for the Big Eight Golf Championships, which will begin today at Lawrence's Alvamar Country Club, the K-State women golfers turned in what Coach Russ Bunker called a "disappointing" performance at the Il-lini Classic Friday and Saturday.

After carding a best-ever 54-hole total of 981 at the Lady Buckeye Spring Classic one week ago, the K-State women battled rain and poor conditions enroute to a seventh-place finish with a score of 1,035.

Host Illinois won the nine-team tourney with a 986, while Northern Illinois was second at 992, and Southern Illinois was third with

"Those courses are very different courses," Bunker said of the Ohio State course the K-State women set the record on, and the Illinois course they played on this past weekend. "But the girls didn't play very well and it was Adena Hagedorn paced the Wildcat women. She ended the three-round tourney with scores of 86-84-81 for a total of 251 to lace her in a tie for eighth with outhern Illinois' Lisa Meritt.

"I thought Adena could have easily finished in the top five," Bunker said. "If she could have just got some of her putts down I snow she could have been in the top five, but any time you have 36 putts, you've had a bad putting round, and she knows that."

Chris Adams placed 22nd with a 257, Valerie Hahn was 30th at 260, Theresa Coyle was 40th at 271 and Jill Zientara was 42nd at

"It's been a tough season so far," Bunker said. "We expected a little bit better results. But the girls seem to surprise me. When I think they're down they pop back

Which is exactly what Bunker hopes they will do today and Tuesday at Alvamar where the seven Big Eight schools that have golf programs (Colorado does not) will tee off in two 27-hole rounds each day.

K-State was a unanimous choice to finish in the conference basement, but Bunker said the squad could possibly surprise some people.

"They're out to prove they can play with the other schools," Bunker said. "They know the Big Eight coaches picked them to finish last and that bothers them."

Should K-State get out of the Big Eight cellar, it would be the first time ever for the Wildcat

"This might be a time when we could sneak up on some people," Bunker said. "It's the final tournament of the year and the most

'We'll have to play well to rise out of the cellar, and this year the Big Eight's as tough as ever from top to bottom."

Oklahoma State is a heavy favorite to win the title, while Bunker said he thought Kansas and Nebraska should fight it out for second. Missouri and Oklahoma should be right behind them, while K-State will be eyeing Iowa State.

"The girls played really well in their practice round (at Alvamar Sunday), so that's a little encouraging," Bunker said. "Now, we have to beat Iowa State. I think if we shoot 990 we'll be real close."

Dulan shines in grid scrimmage

By Scott Paske Sports Reporter

There was no question Saturday's two-and-a-half hour intrasquad football scrimmage at KSU Stadium had a practice atmosphere. Secondary coach Bobby Stoops made sure of it.

On the first play of the Wildcat offense's second drive, wide receiver Frank Hernandez slipped past senior defensive back Mike Lykins on a deep route. Hernandez dropped Carl Straw's pass, but Stoops was not pleased.

Lykins performed a set of pushups for the mistake.

Otherwise, the 16th workout of K-State's spring practice was more formal than the others, as the 'Cats ran a script of plays with several combinations of offensive and defensive units. The scoreboard was turned off, but the 'Cats offense reached the end zone four times in eight possessions. Straw directed all of the scoring

K-State coach Bill Snyder was pleased with the team's first public workout in the warm weekend weather.

"This was a tough day because of the heat," Snyder said. "We have not put a great emphasis on conditioning this spring, but the kids hung in there. They have to understand this wasn't any different than it will be October 8th or October 15th."

If Saturday's offensive performance carries over to those fall dates, look for more balance from the 1990 squad. The 'Cats struck two times on the ground and twice in the air.

Senior Antoine Dulan led the rushing attack, carrying four times for 127 yards, including 70 on a touchdown to conclude the scrimmage.

man carried nine times for 72 yards, with 53 coming on a sweep to the right side.

"We're establishing depth at the running back position that I'm fairly comfortable with," Snyder said. "Our kids are running harder than they've run at any time since I've been here.' Straw led the air attack, completing 4-of-7 attempts for 111 yards and touchdowns to Hernandez and Richard Boyd. Paul Watson was 2-of-2 for 28 yards. Redshirt freshman Jason Smargiasso completed 1-of-2 for 13 yards.

Sophomore Matt Garber ran plays during the situation portion of the scrimmage. Chris Cobb did not participate because of a shoulder injury.

"Our quarterback position is still generally wide open," Snyder said.

Junior running back David Bow- "Somebody needs to jump out and take the lead to be our No. 1."

Sophomore linebacker Brooks Barta led the defense with five

"Scrimmages like these are always a little shaky because you may have to call them off at any given moment because of the numbers," Snyder said. "We're thin right now, but we'll have people coming in this fall who will hopefully give us the depth we need to have a chance.'

K-State concludes spring practice Saturday with a varsity-alumni contest at KSU Stadium. Kickoff is slated for 1:10 p.m.

The 'Cats will open the 1990 regular season Sept. 8, at home against Western Illinois in a 6:30 p.m. contest. K-State's other non-conference games are with New Mexico State, Northern Illinois and New Mexico.

Chiefs go after linebacker in round

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - The Kansas City Chiefs, making linebacker their top priority a second straight year, opted for Michigan State's Percy Snow Sunday with their first pick in the NFL draft.

The 6-2, 244-pound Snow won the Butkus award as the nation's top linebacker and led the Big Ten in tackles last season. One of the blockers he competed most fiercely against throughout his college career, Notre Dame guard-center Tim Grunhard, was the choice of the Chiefs in the second round.

"Maybe we can be friends now," Grunhard said.

The much-honored Snow was the fifth linebacker taken in the first round but the first inside linebacker.

"He's a big, physical inside linebacker," said Coach Marty Schottenheimer. "He's got a feistiness about him. He's a tough, aggressive player who fits the mold we're looking for." Snow, who has a reputation as a punishing tackler, said he was not alarmed to see four linebackers go

"I felt I was the best," he said. "But it's all going to come down basically to who wants it most when you put the pads on." The Chiefs could hardly ask for more than they got from their first-round pick in 1989, Peterson's first as the team's president and general manager. Alabama's Derrick Thomas, who won the Butkus Award in 1989, provided the inside pass rush that had been missing in Kansas City for more than a decade and was named the Associated Press AFC defensive newcomer of the year.

Partly as a result of Thomas' play, the Chiefs' defense improved to No. 2 statistically in the NFL. There had been widespread speculation the Chiefs would therefore opt for a running back or wide receiver.
"I said it last year and I'll say it this year," Peterson told reporters. "I think you win with defense in the NFL. Every time you get a chance to upgrade your defense, you take advantage of it."

Snow started every game at middle linebacker for Michigan State since his sophomore year and did not hesitate when asked what he brings to the Chiefs.

"A guy who's going to give 100 percent every play," he said. "Maybe a little bit more beef, a little bit more intensity, a little bit more hard work. I'm a team player and I'm going to go in there and give it my best." Besides the Butkus Award, Snow also received the prestigious Lombardi Award his senior year.

"I don't let my head get too big," he said. "Success is fine, but I know it can blow up in your face. I take it day-by-day and step-by-step. I know matched up against Percy Snow?

it could be over at any time."

The 6-3, 291-pound Brunhard, who will get his degree this May in pre-law, will be groomed to replace the aging former all-pro Mike Webster at center.

"Mike Webster has been in the league 16 years. I'm hoping I can learn a lot of things from him," Grunhard said. "I think when he was in the pros, I was four years old. It's hard to believe I'll be competing with a person of that magnitude. Choosing Grunhard, Schottenheimer said "continues along with what we're trying to do ... getting people who are tough, aggressive and strong-minded individuals. He's a guy who fares very well against the top competition."

And how did he do in those Michigan State-Notre Dame battles when back of one of their bikes.

Bill Reece, Manhattan, signs an enlarged proclamation recognizing Victims' Rights Week during a ceremony in Sunset Cemetery Sunday afternoon. Mothers Against Drunk Drivers organized the event.

MADD sponsors ceremony to commemorate victims

By The Collegian Staff

A freshly-planted bed of red, white and blue petunias at the west entrance of the Sunset Cemetery was dedicated Sunday to victims of drunk driving accidents.

Mayor Dick Hayter, Attorney General Bob Stephan and Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, signed a proclamation in favor of recognizing the victims as part of the national Victims' Rights Week

The Riley County chapter of Mothers Against Drunk Drivers sponsored the dedication of the flower bed, which drew a crowd of about 25 observers.

Stephan spoke about the rights of victims shortly after Hayter read the proclamation, Senate Resolution

"It takes a nucleus like this to get things done" for victims' rights issues, he said, commending

MADD for organizing the event. Stephan praised the Kansas laws passed last year regarding victims' rights. The laws require that crime victims and their families be notified of all public hearings and be given the opportunity to be heard in court. Stephan said they were some of the best state laws in the country. He also said more should be done to battle incidents of drunk driving. "The problem of drunk driving can be controlled if/people care," he Stephan called for tougher punishments for those convicted of drunk driving. He cited the European practice of confiscating the vehicle on the first offense as a way of dealing with drunk drivers. He said if someone whose car was taken for a drunk driving conviction were to ask him what they were to do without their vehicle, he would ask them what they had done with it when they had it.

Stephan said confiscating vehicles would be much more effective punishment.

Gov. Mike Hayden sent his public liaison, Joe de la Torre, to sign the proclamation on his behalf and to make people aware of his knowledge of the issue.

"My presence here signifies the concern the governor has," de la Torre said.

The proclamation and a copy of the statute will be on display in the Manhattan Town Center.

Commission finds rural areas fighting fear of AIDS

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — It was like a journey back in time when the Na-tional AIDS Commission traveled to south Georgia last week for a firsthand look at how rural areas are coping with the deadly disease.

"I'm afraid we're seeing history repeat itself," said Dr. June Osborn, commission spent two days in Waycross, Albany and Macon visiting with AIDS patients and talking with health care professionals.

"The same fear, the same isolation for people with AIDS, the same difficulty in mobilizing coordinated care that we saw in the beginning of the chairwoman of the panel, after the urban epidemic back a few years ago is happening all over again," she

> The commission's trip came on the heels of a federal Centers for Disease Control report that AIDS is spreading more rapidly in rural areas than in cities. From 1988 to 1989, the CDC found that nonmetropolitan areas had a 37 percent increase in new AIDS cases while metro areas had only a 5 percent gain.

In Georgia, the state Department of Human Resources reported in January that the number of AIDS cases had tripled in two years, with the rapid spread of the disease in rural parts of the state linked to drug users.

Smooth Latin moves

Organization promotes culture through ethnic dance lessons

By Tim Clopton Collegian Reporter

The sounds of shuffling feet, laughter and Latin rhythms filled the air of Putnam Hall Saturday evening.

Two hours of salsa dance lessons were provided by the Hispanic-American Leadership Organization. There was no charge for the lessons, which were open to everyone.

"It was a great time," said David Kuhlmann, freshman in pre-law. "It's good to learn something new, something from another culture. I get sick of doing the same thing all the time, so now when I'm somewhere in the 'ville and a top-40 song comes on, I can try doing the mambo to it."

Maribel Landau, sophomore in environmental design and coordinator of the event, said the lessons were a promotional event for the Latin dance scheduled for 10 p.m. Saturday in the Union ballroom.

"We want our group (HALO) to be known on campus and we want to share our culture with others," Landau said. "We wanted to teach them to dance so they wouldn't be scared to come to the dance."

The lessons were given by Mike Bennett and Kim Carges, dance instructors for UFM.

The basic steps to dances such as the cha-cha and mambo were first taught to the audience of about 30. Variations were then added after the students practiced the basic steps.

Roxana Ortiz, freshman in hotel and restaurant management from Costa Rica, said the salsa is a specific dance that comes from Latin America, but Bennett said the definition used in the United States is

"My Anglo definition of salsa dancing is all the Latin dances except the tango," Bennett said. "I grew up knowing salsa to be a generic term for the Latin dances."

Bennett, who has been dancing for 15 years, said salsa dancing is popular on the coasts and southern border states that have a large Latin population.

"Anglos don't do it much because we have a hard time appreciating this rhythm," he said. "It's very foreign to us. It's just subtle rhythms and simple dances if you can just figure out where the foot goes."

Bennett and Ortiz agreed that the dance lessons and the upcoming dance offer more than just dancing.

"The emphasis is to get everyone involved," Bennett said. "This is a cultural exchange and that is one of the things college is supposed to do. It is supposed to expose you to different ideas, concepts and people."

"This is to try to unite all cultures at the University," Ortiz said.

company over whether its services can be considered psychotherapy.

"She's more alert, much more responsive. She seems more aware of what's going on around her. And her communication skills have improved tremendously," said Kersetter, who has been taking care of her mother for the last five years.

Nationwide Insurance, the carrier for Medicare in Ohio, began rejecting claims for the agency's services Oct. 1.

Class provides family activities

By Margaret Clarkin Collegian Reporter

In conjunction with Sunday's Earth Day activities, UFM and Manhattan Parks and Recreation sponsored a kite making and flying class Saturday in Warner Park.

"We've tried hard to have activities coordinated by UFM and done in cooperation with other agencies," said Olivia Collins, UFM family life education coordinator.

Sue Maes, Manhattan, said events such as the kite class get people to participate in community activities. Maes, who was helping her children make and fly their kites, said the event was an opportunity to get out on a Saturday afternoon with her family.

Maes' husband, Dennis Hemmendinger, said he liked how the class was made for the children.

"It's really nice the way it was in tune to what the kids wanted to do," he said. "If they wanted to make turtles (on their kites), they can have them. It's nice for them to be able to make and fly their own kites."

Those individuals who came to the kite class were given materials to use. These consisted of colorful markers, streamers and colored tape.

"It's an inexpensive family activity," Collins said. "The kites are something the children can make themselves."

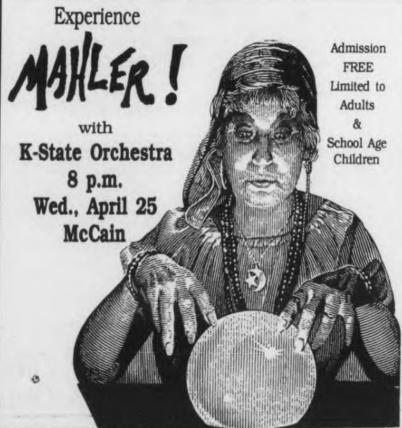

The parents who attended said they also gained something from the experience.

"The parents have had as much fun making them (as the children)," said Linda Salmon, Manhattan High School occupational home economics teacher.

Salmon is also an adviser for MHS's Future Homemakers of America. Students in the club helped the children in the class.

Collins said not not as many families attended the class as had been hoped.

"We've had a few," she said. "We expected more, but there is so much going on today."

Loub expressed confidence in K-State and said it will take, among other things, devotion on the part of past, present and future K-Staters to raise $48 million.

"A lot of dedication and involvement of a lot of K-Staters - that's what it's going to take," he said. "It's going to take responsiveness on the part of all K-Staters to rise to the challenge and say 'we can do this' and we will."

"Your presence here tonight demonstrates your love and concern for K-State and your interest in the challenge presented by the Essential Edge campaign," President Jon Wefald said.

Wefald, who has been credited with aiding in the end of so-called "brain drain" of Kansans to other universities, pleaded emphatically to those attending to give and help bring the University up to the standards it

"Each dollar raised will help a student get a better education, by providing scholarships, professorships, facilities or by funding other impor-tant projects," Wefald said. "Now it is time to give the University the edge it needs in those resources."

The black-tie celebration included a large buffet-style dinner and entertainment by jazz singer Marilyn Maye. The campaign has a goal of $100 million to give K-State the Essential Edge in the next century.

Mike Hayden said K-State is one of the state's greatest assets and resources from the University are pivotal in the continued improvement of

"There are people out there who have submitted information, tried to submit information, so the students can hear what the heck's happening in student government and what the heck's happening with BSU, everything there. But is it printed? No. Because information doesn't create reading. It's controversy that creates people reading the Collegian."

Eric Henry, editorial page editor for the Collegian, said because of the large number of letters and guest columns submitted, it is impossible to print everything.

"It's difficult to decide which letters to run," Henry said. "There are certain criteria that I look for in submitted material: length, timeliness, readability and whether or not the material will encourage intelligent, open discussion."

The issue of Giefer and another senator being quoted in the Collegian referring to members of BSU as "these people" and the resulting controversy was specifically criticized. "They have blown something completely out of the water that was very innocent so they can gain some recognition, so they can gain some glory for themselves at the demise of certain individuals," Giefer said. They have taken it at the expense of certain individuals, like myself, who make nothing of it."

"They don't print a dang thing that gives them information. They'll print something that will create controversy here and that's not what we need," he said.

"I think Senator Giefer's allegations are without merit," Henry said.

"It has never been my intention to fan any fires."

"They have used me as a scapegoat," Giefer said. "They have used me to try to gain some recognition for the Collegian and it is ticking me off. "This is not their purpose. Their purpose is to get some information out to the students, not to create controversy. And maybe if it comes down to nixing a little bit of their funding to get them to change, maybe that's what we should do. Because people, I'm sick of this and if they don't stop it, Lord knows what kind of actions I'm going to to take 'cause it's terrible. It is completely terrible. People have been being used to get gains and glory for the Collegian and will not put up with it.'

Henry said that any attempt by Senate to restrict funding would seriously hamper the watchdog role the press plays as a balance of power against student government.

It's Your World Too ... Don't Trash It!

One great and easy way to clean up is by recycling. Here at K-State there are different pick-up points located in buildings all across campus. Some of these buildings include the following:

> Ackert Bushnell Denison

Dykstra

Library Copy Center Nichols

Power Plant Umberger

So the next time you have something to pitch, take an extra minute to drop it into a recycling can or box instead.

Polhill said he played cards with other hostages during his captivity and tried to keep his mind off the possibility of freedom.

"I strived to continue to be angry, knowing at all times that if I began to lose that anger I would just sort of become a vegetable and I didn't want that to happen," he said in the interview.

The terms of the release, which followed a series of communiques from the Shiite Moslem kidnappers, were not known.

Guards outside the Summerland who witnessed the release said Polhill stepped out of a car that screeched to a halt about 50 yards from the hotel.

He was immediately picked up by a three-car Syrian convoy and driven off at high speed.

The Syrian TV footage showed Polhill being driven through Beirut, sitting in the back of a car and puffing heavily on a cigarette. He appeared drawn after his long ordeal and smiled wanly several times.

At his news conference, Polhill, gaunt and pale, said he was too tired to answer any questions about seven other American hostages or his captivity by the pro-Iranian Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine since Jan. 24, 1987.

Polhill joked to reporters: 'Thirtynine months is a long time to have to stand here."

Standing beside Polhill, Djerejian said: "We will keep communication lines open to all parties that have influence with the hostage takers. We are going to continue doing everything we can, we are going to continue talking, to continue trying."

Also speaking at the news conference, Syria's foreign minister, Farouk al-Sharaa, said he hoped Polhill's release will lead to other hostage releases.

In an editorial in Monday's editions, the Tehran Times newspaper said another hostage should be freed to test 'President Bush's claim that 'goodwill begets goodwill."'

The legalities include how and when the University will remediate, or clean up, the contamination, Lambert said.

Campus safety officials will continue monitoring the site, he said. They will also continue working with the Kansas Department of Health and Environment to determine how remediation can best be accomplished, he said.

"The KDHE will have the final say," Lambert said.

No one knows at this time how much it will cost and how long it will take to clean up the contamination, he said.

The University has been concerned about the site for some time, Lambert said when the test wells were installed in January. The concern, he said, is largely due to the manner in which chemicals and other hazardous materials were deposited there during the 1960s and 1970s.

In contrast to most modern landfills, this landfill has never been surrounded by a protective liner, Lambert said. Protective liners typically help prevent chemicals from seeping into adjacent groundwater.

When the campus landfill was built, he said, there were no laws requiring protective liners.

"It was all perfectly legal at the time," Lambert said.

According to the University's news release, nothing has been deposited in the campus landfill since

New student political organization advocates lobbying effort

By Bill Sier

Collegian Reporter
A new student political organization met Monday to plan a student walkout and trip to Topeka Wednesday to lobby the Legislature for full funding of the enrollment adjustment.

About 30 people were present as Southwind took up the enrollment adjustment issue as one of its first causes at the University.

Southwind is a relatively new student organization with members in four countries. Its name is based on the meaning of the Sioux word Konza, which means "people of the southwind". The name Kansas is derived from this word. Kenneth Delaughder, freshman in business administration, is Southwind's local project manager.

"I was attracted to Southwind by this issue," Delaughder said.

Lee Hallagin, freshman in chemistry and president of Southwind, said he was glad to see some students cared about K-State.

"If this (tuition credit) money is ta- one to get involved as a result of this ken away, I estimate that tuition will go up a hundred dollars," Hallagin

Michael Steinle, graduate student and Student Governing Association state and community affairs coordinator, said he believes it is important for students to go to Topeka and lobby in a dignified manner for the funding.

"Historically, students don't vote," Steinle said. "We need to go up there in a dignified manner and remind the Legislature that we are taxpayers, too.

Students will be leaving campus at 8 a.m. Wednesday and will arrive in Topeka before the Legislature goes into session. There will be a press conference at the Statehouse at 11

For those students unable to make the trip to Topeka, a rally is scheduled for 4 p.m. in front of Anderson

Delaughder said he wants every-meeting.

'We need to send a message to Topeka," Delaughder said "that we care about what happens to K-State."

Paul Davidson, sophomore undecided and public relations representative for Southwind, said he believes the resulting decline in faculty morale from the proposed cut in funding will affect the quality of education at the University.

"It further makes it hard for the University to effectively plan ahead," Davidson said.

Southwind is the brainchild of Michael Roach, sophomore in mechanical engineering, and Ken Sivaraman, a student at George Mason University in Virginia.

It is the direct result of a conversation the two were having over the BITNET computer network.

Southwind has members in several states and in four countries. Members communicate using computers.

alumni, parents support

By Todd Fertig Collegian Reporter

A letter sent by the Alumni Association concerning proposed reductions in the University's budget is designed to prompt alumni and parents of students to contact the Kansas Legislature.

The letter, dated April 12, was written by Stephen Morris, national president of the alumni association. It details the state legislature's proposed budget, which excludes enrollment adjustment monies previously granted for enrollment increases.

Alumni and parents of students have been contacting legislators by phone or mail, expressing disatisfaction with the omission of funds, said John Fairman, assistant vicepresident of University relations.

"There's been considerable response to the letter and the announcement of the budget proposal," Fairman said. "The constituents are coming to clearly understand the impact that the loss of enrollment adjustment funds will have upon the University. I believe there's a lot of support growing across the state."

The alumni board of directors issued a press release Friday stating that the board had unanimously passed a resolution supporting reinstatement of the enrollment adjustment funds, said Amy Renz, associate director of the alumni association. Morris has received many positive comments about the letter, Renz said. The letter recounts the loss of $2 million in 1986 because of decreased enrollments from 1983 to 1985. The Legislature gave full funding to other state institutions that had experienced increased enrollments, challenging K-State to seek similar increases, the letter said. The letter also contained a news release containing the reactions of President Jon Wefald and Provost Jim Coffman to the proposed reductions.

The letter said the University, which has seen an increase in enrollment of about 4,000 students since 1986, would be forced to reduce enrollments to maintain its standard of education. "I am asking you to write to your local legislators and the governor expressing that K-Staters are fully aware of the difficult funding situation facing Kansas and that we accept that the final year of the 'Margin of Excellence' must be delayed," Morris wrote in the letter. "However, K-State and the other Regents' universities which have experienced sharp enrollment increases must become a higher priority for the limited dollars available for their base budgets if we are to provide the quality education Kansans deserve and, now,

Swarm gathers at apartment house before establishing new colony site

By Lori Stauffer Collegian Reporter

Students aren't the only ones taking advantage of the warm spring weather.

A swarm of honey bees, in search of a new nest, began gathering on a stone porch post of an apartment house on Houston Street early Monday.

The swarm was about two feet wide, a foot long and three inches thick on the surface of the porch.

One of the first people to discover the swarm was Walter Schumm, associate professor of human development and family studies, who lives down the street from the apartment house. He said the swarm began to form around 11 a.m. and had grown about two-thirds in size by 11:30 a.m.

Schumm said he didn't get too close to the swarm because he had a bad experience with bees when he was a child. He said that when he was eight years old, he tried to tear a hive apart and was stung twice.

Shumm said he didn't know if he was allergic to bees, but reacted pretty badly to those

"I haven't tested it since then," he said.

George McCauley, a graduate teaching assistant in the department of entomology, lives in the apartment building where the bees were swarming.

McCauley studied economic insects, which have no social organization. He said he is not familiar with honey bees, which are social insects.

"This is the first time I've seen anything like this," he Bee keeper Rich Marteney, St. George, said swarming is common during the spring months as bees leave overcrowded hives to look for a place to nest.

"Swarming is the bees' natural form of reproduction," Marteney said.

Forum addresses economic, environmental criteria for placement of future sites

> By Elvyn Jones Collegian Reporter

The economic concerns of land value, transportation cost and construction often conflict with environ-Murray, graduate student in

In the past, this conflict has led to the placement of landfills on cheap, marginal ground, Murray said. Like the current Riley County Landfill, they are often placed on marshes or wetlands close to water tables and on flood plains, which may lead to water supply contamination. Murray spoke to a small audience in Union Forum Hall Monday afternoon. His lecture was the first of a series of faculty environmental lectures sponsored by Students Acting to Save a Vulnerable Environment as part of Earth Week 1990.

The Riley County Landfill is over capacity and is scheduled to be closed, Murray said. The county has joined in a compact with Geary and Morris Counties to develop a new landfill. Other counties might join the compact in the future.

An awareness of all environmental and economic factors will increase the credibility of any site selected after public debate, he said.

Proper planning in selecting new mental concerns when landfill sites landfill sites now include environare being selected, said Michael mental critera such as flood plains, water table levels, seismic activity and soil permabilitly, he said. With regard to any landfill, reducing the amount of waste going into a landfill to prolong its use requires a change in lifestyle on the part of the users, Murray said.

"Eighty percent of what we place in landfills doesn't need to be there,"

Most material is recyclable, reusable or too dangerous to be placed in a landfill, Murray said. People need to make the effort to recycle what they can and separate their hazardous waste so it can be disposed of in the proper manner.

Although the trend of the last 10 years has been away from government regulation of such activities, the cost to the public of opening new and more distant landfills may add emphasis to these changes, Murray ■ See LANDFILL, Page 10A

Panel describes HIV experiences to group

By Melissa Simpson Staff Reporter

Two HIV-infected people, a woman whose son died of AIDS and two people who handle AIDS cases spoke to less than 20 people Monday about their personal and professional dealings with the HIV infections.

The panel had assembled in the K-State Union Courtyard for the beginning of Condom Sense Week, which began Monday and will last until Friday.

Lafene Health Educator Barb Lewis, panel discussion mediator, encouraged the audience to direct questions to the panelists.

"In the next four to five years, all of you students will be associated in some way with someone that has AIDS," Lewis said. "Either your friends will be infected or maybe even your family."

Marcene Wachsnicht, the mother of a son who died of AIDS, is also a volunteer working with AIDS- or HIV-infected patients.

She said her son moved back home for the last six months of his life because he was in constant pain.

"When my son would go to the doctor, we always had to worry about the nurses and doctors, and we made sure they wore gloves," she said. "One nurse in California gave him a shot without gloves, and the needle pricked her leg. We were scared, and she was scared. She didn't become infected, but there was that constant worry every where and every day. "We shouldn't shun those with AIDS. We should help them." The next panelist, who would only be referred to as Sharon, has been HIV-infected for eight years. She is considered a long-term survivor, and is taking AZT, a drug that slows and hinders the effects of being infected.

"I started taking AZT two years ago, and I may be able to continue taking it for only about a year," she said. "It sometimes causes a resistance."

Sharon said the most important fact that students should realize is that through education, they can help control the spread of disease.

"You have the chance to be educated and not become infected," she said. "By practicing safe sex you can control it, but I didn't have the opportunity to receive the education you

Sharon said before she was a confirmed HIV-positive case, doctors couldn't confirm or pinpoint what disease she had. She was told she had mononucleosis for more than a year, and she was also told she had the flu. A rapid weight loss, when she wasn't trying to lose weight, urged her to get

Germans reach agreement

EAST BERLIN (AP) — West Germany agreed on Monday to give East Germans a bigger share of Western wealth as their struggling nation is merged with its rich neighbor.

In a surprising concession, West Germany said it would exchange each virtually worthless East German mark paid to workers and pensioners for one strong West German mark.

The 1-1 rate would apply to wages and pensions and to savings accounts of up to 4,000 marks ($2,300), said Dieter Vogel, spokesman for West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl.

The East German government had demanded the 1-1 rate to protect workers from higher living costs in a unified Germany and the loss of huge subsidies that existed in the former social-

East German political factions applauded the wage concession but criticized the limit on savings accounts. Kohl made the proposal the day before he was to meet with East German Prime Minister Lothar de Maiziere in Bonn to discuss their differences over reunification.

It came amid reports that the number of East Germans fleeing their crumbling economy for West Germany is continuing at a rate of more than 4,000 a week.

U.S., Soviet talks still planned

WASHINGTON (AP) - The White House on Monday welcomed what it called signs of flexibility from Moscow in its standoff with Lithuania, and said President Bush will meet with congressional leaders Tuesday to discuss the crisis.

The State Department said U.S.-Soviet trade talks are still scheduled to begin in Paris on Tuesday.

Bush, answering reporters who asked if he might call off those talks in response to the Soviet economic crackdown, said: "I'll sure let you know when I make a decision."

Secretary of State James A. Baker III cautioned last week that economic relations are being put to risk by Soviet actions in Lithuania.

In another sign of business as usual, a senior State Department official said Monday that Baker will meet May 5 in Bonn with the foreign ministers of the Soviet Union, Britain and France on security concerns raised by prospects of German unification.

In Moscow, the spokesman for Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev said the Kremlin might negotiate with Lithuania if it freezes its March 11 declaration of independence for two years.

Derailment injures 33

BATAVIA, Iowa (AP) A 15-car Amtrak passenger train derailed Monday, injuring more than 30 of the 400 people aboard, authorities said.

Nine cars of the eastbound California Zephyr derailed about 1:25 p.m. on Burlington Northern tracks, authorities said.

The train was carrying 394 passengers and about 20 crew members, said Debbie Hare, an Amtrak spokeswoman in Chicago.

Thirty-three people sustained injuries serious enough to be taken to hospitals, said Iowa State Patrol Lt. Ronald Moon. He said there were no known fatalities.

The cars began to run off the track just before it reached a crossing on the southern edge of this town of 525 residents, 90 miles southeast of Des Moines. The cause of the derailment was under investigation.

The train had 12 passenger cars and three locomotives, Hare said. Four cars were left on their side.

Rock band members arrested

SAN ANTONIO (AP) - Two members of a California rock band, Faster Pussycat, were arrested early Monday after fights erupted when police tried to shut down their concert because of profane language, authorities said.

Officers had warned the band to tone down their language at Hemisfair Park, where the concert started Sunday night, and one musician responded by leading the crowd in an obscene chant directed at the police, officers said.

Auditorium workers then cut off power to the stage about 30 minutes before the scheduled end of the concert.

When the music stopped, the chanting crowd surged toward the stage and broke several barricades. No injuries were reported, police said.

One band member was arrested after he damaged stage equipment, police said, and a second was arrested when he tried to intercede while the first man was handcuffed, authori-

Man kills former fiancee, self

WICHITA (AP) - About two months after the breakup of a longtime relationship, an El Dorado man shot his ex-girlfriend as she tried to run from him and then turned the handgun on himself early Sunday in a parking lot, police said.

Ray L. Haigler, 21, shot Sheila Ann Moore, 20, of El Dorado, three times and shot himself twice shortly before 1 a.m. Sunday, police said. Both were pronounced dead at HCA Wesley Medical Center.

After a five-year relationship, Moore recently had broken off her engagement with Haigler, said her sister, Teresa O'Roke, of El Dorado.

"She had been trying to break it off with Ray for quite a while," O'Roke said. But Haigler, of El Dorado, called her often and followed her around.

Moore went out Saturday night with a group of friends, including a new boyfriend, for an evening of bowling.

Haigler decided to search for her Saturday night. He picked up two friends in El Dorado and drove to Wichita.

"He entered the bowling alley and asked her to come outside and go with him and talk with him alone in his car," said Lt. Mike McKenna, police spokesman.

They drove around and then returned to the bowling alley, McKenna said.

"He stopped the vehicle and when she got out, he got out of the car with the gun," McKenna said.

He tried to hold onto her but she started to run. With their friends looking on, he fired the first shot, which struck her in the back, knocking her to the ground, McKenna said.

"He then fired a shot into his chest. ... He walked over to her and shot her twice more in the chest," McKenna said. "Then he turned the gun on himself a second time."

'Grievance' brings GE strike

WINFIELD (AP) - Union-covered hourly workers went on strike the General Electric Aircraft Engine Maintenance Center at Strother Field Monday in a dispute over a disciplinary case.

"The strike is over an exhausted grievance involving a sus-pension of an employee last June," said Alan Parrish, spokesman for Local 1004 of the International Union of Engineers.

The union represents about 750 of the 1,000 workers at the plant, located in an industrial park about five miles south of Winfield in south central Kansas.

Neither Parrish nor GE spokesman Vince Downs would provide details of the case that led to the walkout. Downs said it was a personnel matter.

Retired dean enjoys change of pace

Hoeflin fills time with letters, collection of angel figurines

By Margaret Clarkin Collegian Reporter

Ruth Hoeflin sat on her floral couch reminiscing, surrounded by her collection of small angel figurines.

"One of my former students heard in a Colorado newspaper that someone was starting an angel club," Hoeflin said. "She wrote me about it and first thing I knew I was a charter member."

I knew I was a charter member.'
Each year, she gets a few more angels. Hoeflin said at Christmas time she has to have six trees because she has so many angels.

"This year when I packed them away, I counted them and I'm now up to 991," Hoeflin said. "I'm not quite up to 1,000."

Hoeflin, retired dean of human ecology, lives alone, and she said she enjoys it.

"I think it's hard for people to understand how you can live alone and not feel sorry for yourself," Hoeflin said. "Well, I've been around people all my life, worked long hours, ran nursery schools, taught college classes, been in administration. It's just kind of nice to not have to be on my good behavior all the time."

Hoeflin started her career as a nursery school teacher. She came to K-State in 1957, became dean of the College of Home Economics, now Human Ecology, and retired from the University in 1988.

Hoeflin, who stands 5 feet 1 inch tall, never thinks about her height until she stands next to someone.

"I started out to be a nursery school teacher because I wanted to be taller than the children," Hoeflin said. "It never dawned on me that I would be dean in charge of all these tall people."

In 1969 and 1970, Hoeflin, then a home economics instructor, received some Education Profession Development Act Grants to prepare junior college home economic teachers. The associate dean at the time told Hoeflin not to apply for more than two grants, because he said women never finish their degrees. Dean Doretta Hoffman told Hoeflin to ask for 12 scholarships.

"So I asked for 12 scholarships," Hoeflin said. "After all, she was my boss. And I got 10, which shocked them all."

The women had to promise to finish the program.

"By the time we got through in about 1974, 52 women had gone through the scholarship program and everyone finished and received a master's," she said.

Sixteen years ago, when Hoeflin was associate dean, she was asked to replace Hoffman and become acting dean of the college. Hoffman could no longer continue because of poor health.

Four other Big Eight universities were also looking for home economics deans at the time, so she applied, Hoeflin said.

"I thought it was time for a change," she said. "I've been here in one spot for the longest job in my life."

yet when K-State offered her the position as dean, she accepted.

Hoffman continued to work in Justin Hall when Hoeflin took over as acting dean. Some of the faculty and students thought she would be influenced in making decisions by the former dean, Hoeflin said.

Hoeflin recalled a time when she felt she had to go against Hoffman's wishes. When a professor asked for tenure, the former dean wasn't sure that it should be granted, Hoeflin said.

"I even pounded the table and said 'Now, Dr. Hoffman, I am acting dean, and this is my decision," Hoeflin said. "She apologized the next day."

At Hoeflin's retirement dinner, she found out that the house she had worked to transform from a farmhouse into a day care center had been named the Ruth Hoeflin said she keeps herself busy by writing more than 30 letters a month to friends all over the country.

"I'm doing what I want for a change," she said. "Of course, people always ask if I'm doing a lot of traveling, but I did a lot of traveling as dean.

"Dean (Barbara) Stowe asked me to work on a book about the history of home economics, so that took a lot of time," Hoeflin said. Hoeflin's book, "History of a College: from Woman's Course to Home Economics to Human Ecology," was published last spring.

—Director of Counseling Manhattan High School QUESTION: How does the USD No. 383 "budget per pupil" compare with other districts of similar size?

ANSWER: The "budget per pupil" in Manhattan/Ogden school district (USD 383) is one of the lowest in the state among the 304 school districts. A "budget per pupil" comparison with other school districts of comparable size shows how effectively we use the existing funds in our budget on a yearly basis:

Manhattan *2806 Emporia *2931 Salina *2940 Junction City *3040 Garden City *3070 Lawrence *3449

USD 383 has 6354 students. This means that if we spent and additional *643 per student that Lawrence, for example, spends on their students, USD 383 would have over *4 million more in the budget each year. (*4,085,622) Manhattan/Ogden continues to remain highly competitive with other Kansas school systems despite this serious discrepancy in funding.

Walk

Imagine this: you're a senior, ready to graduate and hit the real world running. You report to your first class in August, the class that you've waited four long, torturous years to take. It's the one you can't graduate without.

With a smile, you enter the classroom, only to find a notice scratched on the blackboard: "Sorry, this class has been canceled. Try again next August."

Now you can wake up and smell the coffee. This is not imaginary this is real. If the state Legislature executes its plans to cut $2.1 million from the enrollment adjustment it promised just a few years ago, students will have to deal with between 100 and 300 canceled classes next fall. These will not just be introductory freshman classes, but many upper-level courses as University. In the early part of this century, the Legislature was on the verge of making the University of Kansas the state's flagship university and turing K-State into a vocational training school.

But the students rallied and fought back. With money from their own pockets, they leased an entire passenger train and brought the Legislature to Manhattan. They showed legislators, first hand, that K-State was more than just a votech. The legislators returned to Topeka, thoroughly impressed with K-State, and it remains a university today.

A walkout is planned so students and supporters can go to the state Capitol and protest this cut.

Don't attend classes Wednesday. Make the trip to Topeka. If you can't get to Topeka, then go to the rally scheduled for 4 p.m. north of Anderson Hall.

Funding increase crucial

read President Jon Wefald's comments on the need for the full enrollment adjustment increase for K-State with a great sense of comraderie. On Sheila Jan. 8, when Gov. Hayden's budget was first Hochhauser presented to the Kansas Legislature, we realized that only 50 percent of the enrollment adjustment increase had been funded. Since then, I have been working to convince members of the Legislature on both sides of the aisle that funding the full enrollment adjustment increase is crucial to K-State and to the state of Kansas.

In my analysis, there are five factors that have worked against the efforts of the Riley County legislative delegation to restore the full enrollment adjustment increase to K-State's budget. These are:

1. The clamor for costly property tax relief that is being heard statewide and being felt most strongly by legislators who do not have regents universities in their districts.

2. Governor Hayden's budget proposals, which slashed almost $9 million from the regents 1990 budget and more than $34 million from the 1991 request.

There are many in the Legislature who feel that the governor's budget must be supported, and they labor very hard to do so, despite the consequences to the state.

3. The priorities for budget restoration that were set out by the Kansas Board of Regents. As chair of the Higher Education Task Force, I invited Stanley Koplik, executive director of the Board of Regents, to explain how the Board of Regents set priorities for restoring items that Gov. Hayden had cut from the regents budget. I was dismayed to learn that the regents had set the restoration of the full enrollment adjustment as number six on a list of 10 priorities because it affected only five of the seven regents institutions. Regent Charles Hostetler was unable to persuade the board to reorder its priorities, with the result that some regents institutions refused to support us, using the Board of Regents priorities as the reason.

4. The willingness of the legislators from Douglas County, who are representing the University of Kansas, and the K.U. lobbyists GUEST COLUMNIST to work against the full enrollment adjustment.

Shortly after our meeting with Dr. Koplik, we learned that the Douglas County delegation would not support K-State's quest for the full enrollment adjustment increase because, "it was not a regents priority."

5. Miscellaneous factors I will call the "somany-needs-and-I'm-mad-at-them-anyway" reasoning.

In these tough fiscal times, legislators are faced with competing needs to be addressed from the state coffers. Many legislators view the state's universities as ill-managed institutions that are always seeking more money. They ask why they should vote to put multiple millions of dollars into the K-State n addition, at least five legislators expressed to me their personal anger at the Board of Regents for making selective admissions a priority. These legislators were angry enough that they were willing to vote against any restoration of dollars to the regents budgets, no matter who was affected.

These factors and others combined to thwart the efforts of the Riley County delegation during the regular legislative session to obtain the full enrollment adjustment increase for K-State. I had more than eight amendments drafted to restore various items requested by the regents in their 1991 budget that were cut by Gov. Hayden. I personally carried the amendment to restore the full enrollment adjustment increase. Representative Rochelle Chronister argued against the amendment, stating both that the governor's budget must be supported and that K-State should not be rewarded for permitting just anyone to enter its doors to boost its sagging enrollment. Representative John Solbach of Lawrence argued that funding the enrollment adjustment increase would be good for K-State, but bad for the rest of the regents

I argued that the enrollment adjustment increase was a contract and that fulfilling that contract with K-State was only fair. I reminded the House that President Wefald had been hired specifically to increase enrollment at K-State and that he had done so in an admirable and effective manner. Far from recruiting just anyone, I told my colleagues that K-State's entering classes since 1987 had attracted the best and brightest high school graduates the state of Kansas has to offer. All these arguments fell on deaf ears. The amendment was defeated.

Rep. Katha Hurt then offered an amendment to increase the enrollment adjustment to K-State by $580,000. Although not the full amount, Rep. Hurt's amendment was offered to help our negotiating position in the budget conference committee. Unfortunately, that amendment, too, was defeated. Although $400,000 was added to the enrollment adjustment following your representatives' lobbying of the House conferees and your senator's lobbying of the Senate conferces, K-State's enrollment adjustment is still $2.1 million will continue to fight this worthy, but enormously frustrating, battle for the duration of the legislative session. I welcome the aid of K-State alumni, friends, students, and parents in the effort to see the full enrollment adjustment funded. I hope that this explanation of factors working against us will be helpful to those advocating for K-State in the political process. I offer my assistance to all who wish to see justice and fairness done on this issue.

Sheila Hochhauser represents the 67th district (Manhattan) in the Kansas House of Representatives.

"The loudest squeaks get oiled." State Representative, Ken Francisco, 90th District. The Kansas Legislature will meet again tomorrow for its wrap-up session. It is very likely that our legislators will debate whether to give K-State its entire enrollment adjustment. In the past few days, many students have asked "What is an enrollment adjustment? How does not receiving the money affect K-State? What can we, as students, do?"

The State of Kansas funds the seven Regents universities according to the number of students enrolled at each university. In the past, if enrollment increases more than one half of one percent over the previous fall, an increase in funding will follow, according to the legislative guidelines. In fall 1988, K-State had an increase of 1,300 students over fall 1987. Following the legislative formula for that increase in students, K-State requested $4.6 million in enrollment adjustments. Because of limited funds, legislators are currently recommending just $2.5 million. This creates a fascinating situation. Several years ago, the leaders of our state called upon the universities to "stop the brain drain." They wanted to keep Kansas high school students in Kansas. K-State made increasing enrollment a high priority. It is sadly ironic that the state now is backing out on the agreement by using our students' $2.1 million on projects like highways, welfare and tax relief. Was there anything on our admismight fund other state projects?

Not receiving the $2.1 million will be very detrimental. The number of classes cancelled could exceed 100 sections. Because the increase of students occurred in fall 1988, students that are currently junior may feel the cuts the hardest. Juniors may not graduate on schedule if necessary classes are cancelled. This cut will affect virtually all K-State students in some way.

I'm painting a grim picture, but fortunately, the state hasn't reached a final decision. There are efforts currently underway to show that students and faculty are concerned about their future.

Today, there will be a table outside the Union with petitions encouraging full funding of the enrollment adjustment. These petitions will show overwhelming support from the student body.

On Wednesday, students going to Topeka will meet at 8 a.m. at the Student Government Office in the K-State Union. Any student who can go is encouraged to do so. We will talk to legislators before they convene at 10 a.m. At 11 a.m., a press conference will be held at the Capitol. At 4 p.m. that afternoon, a rally will be held north of Anderson Hall to discuss the Topeka trip and show on-campus

One important aspect in recruiting new K-State faculty is to promote the quality of life Manhattan offers as well as the quality of our public schools for their children.

Do you know that a serious overcrowding problem is about to overwhelm our schools? My next door neighbor's first-grader was in a room with 38 children from September through December this year. My third grader does not have her own science book due to a shortage of textbooks. The list goes on and

Please, K-State, vote to support District 383 bond issue on May 8. Then you can say to a new recruit, "We are solving the problem."

Minibond sales to finance new Manhattan fire truck

By Julie Fischer Contributing Reporter

Instead of getting a piece of the rock, Manhattan residents will be able to buy a piece of the truck, said Curt Wood, director of finance for Manhattan.

The city will be selling minibonds in $500 denominations to raise $325,000 to finance an aerial fire pumper for the Manhattan Fire Department. The actual cost of the truck is just more than $324,000, said Bill Smith, fire chief.

The new truck will pump 1,250 gallons of water per minute and features a 75-foot ladder that can reach five or six stories, Smith said. It was ordered for the Poyntz fire station, which serves the K-State campus, the industrial park, the downtown area and the Manhattan Town Center.

He said the engine will be an asset to Manhattan because it will reach the top of all buildings on campus and can be operated by one person.

The engine also features a completely enclosed cab, 190 feet of ground ladders in various sizes, hoses, breathing supplies and forceful entry equipment.

Two trucks, a 1967 pumper and a 1970 front-line pumper, will be traded in the deal. Smith said he is not comfortable with the two trucks.

"Trucks are generally bought with 20 years usage in mind, then put on reserve for five years," he said.

Smith said he hopes to get residents involved through the minibond 'Citizenry can buy into a tangible product - their community, their future," Wood said. "Because we are bypassing the middleman, it's a better deal to the public.'

The minibonds will allow small investors to enjoy the tax-free benefits of city bonds.

All applications will be opened at p.m. on June 13 at the Fire Station Headquarters in the order they were received. The City Commission will award the requests to purchase the bonds on June 14 at 4 p.m.

Play to dramatize Holocaust in honor of Remembrance Day By The Collegian Staff

A play dramatizing hope and love will be presented today to commemorate Holocaust Remembrance Day to honor those who died and to serve as an appeal for justice for those living.

The one-woman drama, Childhood, will be presented at 8 p.m. at the International Student Center by Yonat Klar, an Israeli actress living in Lawrence this year, said Norman Fedder, professor of speech. Klar is a daughter of Holocaust sur-vivors and has been involved in projects that tell the stories of children in the Holocaust, he said.

Klar adapted the drama from the book "Childhood" by Jona Oberski, said Yael Carmi, graduate student in speech.

The drama relates the story of the Oberski family's attempted refuge during Nazi occupation of Amsterdam, their capture and internment in the Bergen-Belsen death camp. The story is told

Women golfers last after one

By Chris Hays Sports Editor

K-State golf coach Russ Bunker saw several surprises at the Big Eight Conference women's golf tournament first round Monday at Lawrence's Alvamar Country Club.

Winds gusted up to 30 mph, and then Iowa State, the team that was picked by the conference coaches to finish just ahead of the K-State women, wound up first-round play in third place.

"That surprised the hell out of me," Bunker said. "But they have two or three girls that have really improved and I didn't really count on that, because we really haven't seen them this year.

"As far as our play, it was not very good."

The K-State women finished up the first 27 holes of the 54-hole Big Eight Championships in last place, shooting a dismal 514.

Favorite Oklahoma State finished in first place, two strokes ahead of Kansas, with 464. KU was at 466, while Iowa State surprisingly had 477, Nebraska 481, Missouri 483 and Oklahoma 484.

For the K-State women to get out of the conference cellar for the first time in 13 years, they will have to make up at least 30 strokes in today's second and final round.

"We didn't play very well," Bunker said, citing that wind conditions might have helped the teams that teed off in the earlier rounds. "But we could bounce back. It would take a very, very good round to do that, but you never know what might happen in golf."

Individually, after first-round play, Oklahoma State's Carolyn McKenzie was leading the way with a 75-36-111, while KU's Shelly Triplett was in second with a 77-37-114.

K-State was led by Adena Hagedorn, who shot 83-42 - 125. Valerie Hahn was at 85-43 - 128, Chris Adams was at 87-43 — 130, Jill Zientara was at 90-41 — 131 and Theresa Coyle was at 93-43 — 136.

"I'm not gonna say we can't bounce back," Bunker said. "But we'll have to play awfully well."

As far as our play, it was not very good.

-Russ Bunker, golf coach

The freshman Hahn was playing in her first Big Eight meet, and, despite the nervousness, was still able to finish second on the team.

"Val got her first taste of the Big Eight Championships, and I thought she played pretty well," Bunker said. "She was in a position to have a prety good first round. I was really disappointed for her."

With Iowa State being picked by the conference coaches to finish near the bottom of the standings, Bunker admitted that he was really taken off

"There's no question that Iowa State's the surprise," Bunker said. "And then Nebraska not playing as well as I expected them to."

Bunker said that he felt helpless as far as watching his team struggle in the windy conditions.

"It was a tough day," he said. "It was tough to watch because you just wanted to keep helping them, so

"But (today) we could work to our advantage and make headway, or drop farther back, but we have nothing to lose. We've dropped back quite a way, but the girls believe."

N.C. State names Robinson coach

By The Associated Press

RALEIGH, N.C. - Les Robinson, a former North Carolina State player, was named Monday to succeed Jim Valvano as the Wolfpack's basketball coach.

Robinson, coach and athletic director and coach at East Tennessee State, takes over a program that has been under scrutiny for nearly 11/2 years and still has another year of NCAA probation to serve. The program remains under investigation.

The appointment of Robinson came 16 days after Valvano was forced out when NC State officials agreed on a $500,000 settlement - a $212,000 contract buyout and the balance from the school's booster group, the Wolfpack Club.

Last Friday, NC State named Todd Turner as its new athletic director, a post Valvano was forced to give up last year after the basketball program was placed on two years' NCAA probation when it was found that players sold complimentary tickets and sneakers.

Robinson, who signed a four-year contract at $95,000 per year, also faces the task of trying to keep one of his top players - guard Chris Corchiani - from leaving. After Valvano left, Corciani said he would transfer but he has yet to do so.

"There is no other coaching job in the United States that I would rather have," Robinson said. "I don't know how long they will want me here, but I'm going to be here until they run me off. This is a very, very exciting moment for me, one of the biggest days of my life."

Valvano was under fire because of the poor academic records of his players. Robinson, meanwhile, has been coaching for 16 years and all but one of his players have graduated.

Other problems hounding NC State involve point-shaving allegations and former player Charles Shackleford, who admitted he took $65,000 from two men while still at the school.

Thr 47-year-old Robinson, a 1965 NC State grad, is the 16th head coach for the Wolfpack.

"Les understands the tradition of this university, both athetically and academically there couldn't be a more suitable candidate to lead this program in its continued quest for greatness," said Harold Hopfenburg, acting athletic director until Turner takes over July 1.

Robinson guided the Buccaneers to a 27-7 record and the Southern Conference championship last sea-

Lions want Henry as running back

From Staff and Wire Reports K-State defensive end Maurice Henry was drafted by the Detroit Lions in the sixth round of the NFL's annual collegiate draft Monday.

Henry, a 6-foot, 220-pounder who came to K-State as a running back out of Salina Central High School and then was converted to defense by former K-State coach Stan Parrish, will be looked at by the Lions as a running back. Henry played sparingly on offense during his first two years with the Wildcats due to mild injuries, but then seemed to blossom after being switched to defense. After his first season at linebacker under Parrish, Henry finished second on the team in tackles with 100 stops. He then switched to defensive end under first-year coach Bill Snyder, where he quickly adapted. He was chosen the Big Eight Defensive Player of the Week after the Wildcats' first win in nearly three years against North Texas.

In his final year at K-State, Henry was fourth on the team in tackles with 58 after switching to end.

Another K-State player who was expecting to hear from an NFL team to at least sign him as a free agent was Wildcat free safety Erick Harper, but he had heard nothing by late Monday.

Maurice Henry tackles a North Texas player in the 'Cats' only win last fall. Henry was the sixth-round choice of the Detroit Lions Monday.

Committees to review relief proposals

Plans aim to increase state sales tax in hope of generating $150-$200 million

By The Associated Press

House and Senate tax committees return to Topeka Tuesday, striving for consensus on a tax-increase plan that will generate between $150 million and $200 million for school property

Both committees meet at 1:30 p.m. to begin reviewing revenue-raising proposals put together by their respective committee leaderships as a starting point for getting agreement on bills they can take to the floor for debate when the Legislature reconvenes Wednesday for its wrap-up

The House committee will be con-

TOPEKA — Members of the nearly $150 million, while the Senate committee has a goal of coming up with a plan that would produce about $200 million.

Both plans include increasing the state sales tax, now at 4.25 percent; elimination of perhaps as many as a dozen and a half sales tax exemptions, and creating a new individual income tax bracket to tax those with incomes of $100,000 a year or more at a higher rate.

The plan the Senate committee will study also has a component that would raise corporate income taxes, although that part of the plan isn't expected to gain approval.

Both plans envision sending all of the new revenue to the state's 304 local school districts, and requiring them to use it to reduce school property taxes, dollar for dollar.

The money would not reduce other property taxes, such as those collected by cities, counties and other local taxing districts.

Since the districts are expected to raise $730 million from the property tax to finance elementary and secondary education in the 1990-91 school year, if the tax plan raises $150 million it would reduce property taxes by 20.5 percent, and if it raises $200 million, it would roll them back 27.4

Since schools account for less than half the $1.57 billion total property tax burden in Kansas, the total rollback effect under the House plan would be to lower property taxes about 10 percent and under the Senate plan about 13 percent. Sen. Dan Thiessen, R-

Independence, chairman of the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee, said Monday he wants his committee to propose a plan that would raise $243 million, providing money for a 33.3 percent rollback in school taxes or about 15.5 percent overall.

"I would like to have a sizeable sum," said Thiessen, who was at the Statehouse Monday getting ready for the start of his committee's work.

"We started out with a proposal to raise the sales tax a cent and a half, and that would have generated $315 million. It may not be possible to go that high, though."

The Senate plan, developed by Thiessen and Majority Leader Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, as a starting point for the committee's work would:

■ Increase the sales tax threequarters of a cent, rounding off the state sales tax at 5 cents on the dollar. This generates about $160 million

Eliminate about a dozen sales tax exemptions to gain about $10 million more revenue. The major one proposed for elimination is the one that exempts intrastate local telephone and telegraph services to raise $4.1 million.

Others proposed for elimination and the amount of revenue gained are for coin-operated laundry services, $900,000; items purchased by port authorities, $600,000; admissions to municipally-sponsored events, $400,000, and textbook rentals, $300,000.

Workshop prepares students for critical dietetic situations

By Sandy Hegarty Collegian Reporter

A rapidly aging population has many registered dietitians in clinical practice dealing with terminally ill patients.

Because of this, a workshop on death and dying is given once a semester for dietetic students and other special guests, to help prepare them for these critical situations.

The workshop is directed by Deborah Canter, associate professor in hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics, and Sharon Morcos, instructor in hotel, restaurant, institution mangement and dietetics.

Canter and Morcos have actually been involved in the care of terminally ill patients, and have spoken in church groups on the topic of death and dying.

"Seven years ago, I had a student come in and say she didn't feel like she was able to cope with a patient dying," said Morcos. "These students have to learn to cope with their own grief before working with others.

The workshop, which was on Saturday this year, tries to create a feeling of safeness, where students can be real with each other and get in touch with the feeling nobody deals with.

The workshop originally started as a one-hour program and has now extended into an all-day event. Topics range from facts about death to comforting each other to even visiting a funeral home.

"We go to a funeral home to see the stress families have to go through in death situations," Morcos said. "We want them to learn how to get in touch with their own

Gallery displays pottery of art graduate in West Stadium

By Bill Sier Collegian Reporter

Ambry Art Gallery, located in West Stadium, is not the sort of place a person idly passes by and decides to walk into.

Located in a former storage room, even a short person would have to duck to enter it. But Angelo Garzio, professor of art, said he thinks the current exhibit of his former student, Gary D. Tyson, makes the effort worthwhile.

"Strong show," Garzio wrote in the gallery's guest book as the first visitor to the show. "He'll make it." Tyson, who received his bachelor of fine arts degree from K-State in 1989, is now fullfilling his life-long desire to be an artist. "I have always been interested in art," Tyson said, "even before the Navy.'

Tyson returned to college upon retiring from the Navy, after serving for 20 years as a hospital administrator. "It got to the point (in the Navy) where I hated what I did every morning," Tyson said.

Most of the art Tyson completed before he returned to Kansas consisted of drawings. He said he also read about art, but did nothing concentrated in the field until he took a pottery class from Garzio in January

"Gary took to clay like a duck takes to water," Garzio said.

Garzio said Tyson's hard work and avid reading of pottery literature gave Tyson an historical perspective to his work, enabling him to incorporate older styles into his own.

"It normally takes a student four to six years to break away from the influence of a teacher," Garzio said. "Being a more mature student (gave Tyson) the advantage of knowing where he wants to go.'

Tyson said that he often does not name his creations until he has seen how they turn out. He starts out with an idea of what he wants to create, and then looks to see what name suggests itself.

Tyson said that pottery is more than a job to him. It is a vocation. "I have found that pottery can and has become a way of life for me," Tyson wrote in a letter which is posted on the wall of the gallery. Tyson said if you enjoy something, you don't mind doing it as much. As a person gets older, enjoy-what they do. "If I had to do this for someone else," Tyson said, "I would not enjoy it as much.'

KU student arrested for battery Panel

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE - A University of Kansas freshman who was accused last month of making racial slurs to a black woman student has been charged with battery in a weekend incident, Lawrence police said Monday.

Matthew Willenborg, 20, of St. Louis, faces a municipal charge of battering a man who police say tried to persuade him to report a minor automobile accident Saturday moming, said Chris Mulvenon, assistant to the Lawrence police chief.

KU student Anne Dean, who is black, accused Willenborg of knock-

Dean, 19, said she was delivering the pizzas to Willenborg's fratemity house, Sigma Alpha Epsilon. The fraternity suspended Willenborg, although he denied ever making slurs to Dean.

The incident touched off several protests at the university and prompted school officials to launch a plan to improve race relations at the campus with education programs on cultural diversity.

In the incident early Saturday, Willenborg was a passenger in a car that struck an unoccupied vehicle parked in the lot of an apartment complex, Mulvenon said.

Two witnesses, a man and his wife, tried to persuade the two to report the accident, but the students became belligerent, Mulvenon said.

Willenborg was charged with battery and released on $150 bond. The driver, freshman Greg McGivern, was charged with battery, operating under the influence and failing to report an accident.

With the infection comes a lot of illness. Sharon said her most recent illness lasted 15 months. Because of her frequent bouts with illness, she is totally disabled and unemployed.

Panelist Jay Lewallen, an AIDSinfected homosexual, said he is also totally disabled. He also suffers frequent spells of illness; he has had hepatitis and pneumonia.

"I was in Florida when I got pneumonia, and my two-week stay in the hospital cost me about $20,000," Lewallen said. "I was also in the Saint Mary Hospital for three weeks, and it cost around $8,000.

"All of my laundry and trash was placed in separate bags, and I had to wear a mask everywhere," he said. 'The nurses in Florida said they did this because they were worried about me catching a disease in the hospital." Lewallen said his bill for medicine is usually around $700 a month. "People should be cautious and secure and use condoms," Lewallen said. "AIDS causes a lot of pain, and we should support and be friends

Panelist Jay Johnson, clinical di-rector of the Topeka AIDS Project, works with AIDS patients in Topeka, Manhattan, Fort Riley and Emporia.

He said 130,000 AIDS cases have been reported in the United States to date, and 340 cases have been reported in Kansas. The actual number of cases could be higher, he said, because many go unreported.

Johnson said Shawnee County has 30 reported cases and Wichita has more than 70 reported cases.

"You can only get AIDS three ways," Johnson said. "You can get it from unsafe sex, intravenous drug use and an infected mother can give it to her unborn. The highest rising group of infected AIDS people are white, heterosexual women, and 20 percent of the HIV cases are from women in their early 20s."

In closing, Lewis announced that a discussion about placing condom vending machines on campus and in residence halls is scheduled for Wednesday in the Courtyard.

Ceremony changes for graduation day

Commencement exercises seek to better represent University with new elements

By The Collegian Staff

Commencement exercises for the all-University graduation ceremony have been changed in an attempt to enhance representation of the University as a whole.

Students from the graduate school and the College of Arts and Sciences will receive diplomas during the exercises, and for the first time in the history of the ceremony a commencement speaker will give an address, said Hakim Salahu-Din, commencement chair.

All-University exercise will begin at 9 a.m. May 19 in Bramlage Coliseum. All graduating students are invited to attend.

In the past, all students have received their diplomas during individual college ceremonies following the all-University commencements.

The graduate school and arts and sciences ceremonies will proceed as usual, but have been scheduled immediately after one another. These exercises, along with the commencement address, will represent the all-University ceremonies.

"The commencement ceremony is in a stage of development," Salahu-Din said. "We want our graduates to feel good about it. The highlight of the ceremony will be the graduation itself."

The University is considering rotating the colleges whose graduates will receive degrees at the all-University ceremonies, so that all colleges will be represented,

The enhancements have been made in an attempt to focus state-wide attention on commencement at K-State, said Michael Lorenz, head of the Dean's Council ad hoc committee that recommended the changes.

Instead of trying to recognize all the colleges during a usually impersonal University-wide commencement, Lorenz said personal recognition will be given to these students in an attempt to better represent the University as a whole.

Turnout for the all-University exercises is usually poor because most students choose to attend the more personalized ceremonies for the individual colleges, he

Spring commencement ceremonies will for the first time feature a commencement speaker. Don Wilson, archivist of the United States, is scheduled to give the address. Wilson is a 1964 Washburn University graduate and was appointed to head the National Archives by former President Ronald Reagan.

Salahu-Din said 1,596 students are expected to graduate after this spring semester. About 3,500 will graduate for the 1989-90 school year.

"I would estimate that about 85 percent of the 1,596 graduates will participate in the ceremony,' he said. "It will be about the same as last year."

Diplomas for veterinary medicine candidates will be presented at 3 p.m., May 18, in McCain Auditorium. All other undergraduate student diplomas will be awarded May 19 in separate college exercises following the all-University commencement.

Individual college exercises will begin at noon for agriculture, 2 p.m. for engineering and 4 p.m. for business administration in Bramlage.

McCain Auditorium is the site for ceremonies for the colleges of education at noon, architecture and design at 2 p.m. and human ecology at 4 p.m.

Mary Sisson, assistant director of the K-State Union, said a commencement buffet will be served from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. May 19 in the Union Ballroom at a cost of $7.95 per person and $4.50 per child under 10 years. The deadline for reservations is May 11.

Planning vital for interviews

Long, short-term preparations improve chances for students to make favorable first impression

> By Lori Stauffer Collegian Reporter

By making long- and short-range preparations, prospective employees can improve their chances of making a good first impression during an interview.

Long-range preparations include meeting the minimum requirements the business has set, said Bruce Laughlin, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center. This means fulfilling the academic requirements and having the appropriate curricular background.

Short-range preparations are what can give the candidate an extra edge on the competition, he said.

Students should research the company and the information provided about the job opening, Laughlin said. They should read literature about the company and learn about what the company expects from its employees.

An interview serves as a screening process in which the job candidate is given an opportunity to learn more about an organization, he said. At the same time, the prospective employer has the opportunity to evaluate the job

The interviewer will use a 25- to 30-minute interview to find evidence to support his first impression of the candidate which is made within the first seconds of the interview, Laughlin said.

"Within five seconds - some say 15 to 20 seconds, others say one minute the interviewer has made an assumption that 'I like this person or I think I'm going to like this person, or I'm impressed or I think I'm going to be impressed with this person," he said.

Knowing basic information about a possible future employer helps avoid wasting time by asking questions already answered in literature, according to a pamphlet provided by General Electric. A job candidate who repeatedly asks questions answered in the company literature can lead the interviewer to wonder about the candidate's initiative.

Laughlin recommends students prepare by running through a practice interview. The student should have someone playing the role of interviewer and exchange questions and answers," he said. Laughlin said some of the questions asked by interviewers have become tougher in recent years, however, interviewers are generally "not trying to stress the candidates.

Questions may follow a structured or unstructured formula, Laughlin said. Many interviewers use a combination of the two, allowing for spontaneous conversation while looking for specific information.

In structured interviews, the job candidates are asked specific questions. Laughlin said businesses often use this to keep a level of fairness for job applicants.

"It allows them to test candidates the same and compare responses," he said. The unstructured interviews vary from candidate to candidate, depending on the chemistry between the interviewer and the candidate, Laughlin said.

Some questions often require different lengths of answers and students should be aware if interviewers are looking for an answer that is expansive or curt and short. Most responses should be kept to no more than three sentences, according to a list of the 10 interview mistakes compiled by consultants from the firm Goodrich & Sherwood.

Goodrich & Sherwood recommends the candidate "control the interview by listening and asking directed questions."

Richard Clubb, visiting associate professor of psychology, said job candidates should be careful not to do anything to distract the interviewer. Body language is an important aspect in the interview.

"Good body language won't get you the job but it can help," he said.

Clubb said job candidates should avoid nervous, jerky movements or inappropriate behavior, such as picking at teeth and finger nails, or twirling the hair, all of which are signs of nervousness.

Instead, Clubb recommends sitting up straight with the back against the chair and to appear comfortable. Looking directly at the person is also important, while breaking eye contact from time to

When asked a question, many candidates look up in thought, he said. This action says there is a lot of deep thinking going on, but it can also give the interviewer the impression that the person is searching for an answer.

The candidate should, instead, look off for just a moment, then answer, Clubb said.

He said students should have a pleasant facial expression to show they are interested in the conversation, but not have "dumb smiles plastered on their

Questions to expect in the interview

1. Why did you sign up for this interview? Use this opportunity to prove you've researched the company. 2. What is your greatest strength? Give an important strength that will help you in the position. Don't use off-the-wall strengths. 3. What is your greatest weakness?

Don't give the recruiter an opportunity to turn you down. Give a great weakness, like "sensitive to people."

4. Tell me about yourself. Tell about job related information. Cut out non-related fluff.

5. What are your long-term qoals?

Avoid giving goals too far in the future. Instead, rechannel the question, focusing on how you can contribute to the company.

Goods-producing industry declines as service area experiences growth

By Donna Warren Collegian Reporter

Most experts agree the primary changes in career trends for the United States will be in the growth of the service industry and in the decline of the goodsproducing industry.

Dennis Angle, director of Kansas Careers, a division of the College of Education, said service industry jobs are in high demand in Kansas, as well as across the nation.

Angle said, however, he believes the world is not producing less goods, but having them produced in other areas and at a lower cost than in the United States

Another expanding area is jobs which require high-technology

"Technology is dramatically changing the workforce and we have not yet caught up with the impact it has had on society," Angle said.

He said it is important for people to have post-high-school skills, because the number of unskilled jobs is rapidly decreasing.

"If a student drops out of college, the student should get some type of skills elsewhere if possible, or it will be hard for that person to find a job," Angle

Donald Rathbone, dean of engineering, said technology involves all aspects of society.

"We are living in a sophisticated, high-tech society," Rath-

He said engineering, which is considered very "high-tech", is needed to keep society and economics going.

"Because of these and other factors, the demand for engineering degrees across the board is good, if not very good," Rathbone said.

The area of engineering high-est in demand is chemical engineering, he said. Because this curriculum has never had a large enrollment, the outlook for students in chemical engineering is "very, very good."

Kathleen Lowman, assistant director of career planning and placement, said, as a general rule of thumb, the more technical the field, the higher the demand.

Lowman said the less technical the degree, the earlier students need to start building experience and activities to help them be competitive in the job market.

Lowman also said people skills are becoming more important, and students who possess good communication skills will have an advantage when interviewing for jobs.

Jim Akin, associate director of career placement and planning, said regardless of their majors, students should make themselves marketable.

Akin said there are several ways to do this in order to become appealing to potential employers. He said students should obtain work experience related to their major and be able to demonstrate leadership roles through extracurricular activities.

Engineering is not the only and Spanish. Other areas in demand are secondary counseling, instrumental music and English.

He said geographic areas can play an important part in the demand for education majors. Nationally, there are areas such as elementary education, home economics, art and social science education which are not in demand. However, these areas are strong in the Sun Belt, where the population is growing.

Lowman said some researchers and surveys show human ecology to have more candidates than jobs. This is misleading because some tend to group many different areas under the heading of human ecology.

She said some particularly strong areas in K-State's College of Human Ecology are hotel and restaurant management, dietetics and textile chemistry. Dietetics and textile chemistry are highly technical and are experiencing high demand and quick placement for graduates.

Bruce Laughlin, director of career planning and placement, said the changing demographics of the world's population will have a significant impact on the job market.

Laughlin said the increasing number of older people will create many more jobs in the health and finance industries.

"The aging population will need more people to offer financial advisement and counseling to them concerning investments and the preservation of assets," he said. "Health care, health insurance and gerontology will also continue to be very important in meeting the older generation's

Laughlin said the history of K-State graduates indicates students of all majors have the potential to be successful.

"We're very competitive and our alumni have been very successful throughout history," he said. "This is not just recently, but has been true over many, many years.'

Laughlin said the Career Planning and Placement Center at Holtz Hall is instrumental in helping to find jobs for K-State students and graduates.

Laughlin said in a given year, the center is probably visited by 500 employers and about 8,000 on-campus interviews are conducted.

There is a new trend which could be considered a problem or an opportunity, he said. Many of the new jobs in the 1990s will surface from small to medium size employers.

Unfortunately, Laughlin said, these smaller employers have no tradition or history of recruiting on college campuses. Recruiters at these small companies seem to think only large corporations are wanted on campuses, and this is not true.

Even a one-person business can recruit at K-State, he said. Laughlin said students must realize other aspects equally important to a potential employer as a degree in the area in which they are hiring.

"The personal qualities employers are seeking continue to be important regardless of curriculums," he said.

Employers want employees with a fundamentally good attitude, who have strong writing and oral skills, who demonstrate the ability to be productive and who have high energy levels, Laughlin said.

A relatively new character trait being sought by employers is healthy employees who do not drink alcohol or smoke. Laughlin said this type of person will have an advantage in the future because they have a lower rate of absenteeism and a higher rate of productivity.

The most common advice given by university counselors and advisers is for students to choose a major they are interested in and will enjoy.

Angle said students who pursue areas in which they have an interest will not only be happier but will produce better work.

"The key to being successful in any area is to do it well and to be the best you can be," Akin

Stress cited as common cause for school burnout

Coping with daily tasks shown to be key to student relief

By Laura Scroggins Collegian Reports

Regardless of a student's age, national origin, financial status or major, the one thing common to almost anyone in school is burnout.

Burnout, the result of an overabundance of stress, can lead to health problems, said Dr. Larry Moeller, chief of staff at Lafene Student Health Center, Problems can range in severity from headaches and stomach disorders to complete breakdowns.

Martha Sanderlin, graduate assistant in Student Counseling and Personal Services, teaches methods of stress management at University Counseling Services.

Sanderlin said that ideally if a graduating student is feeling stress, he or she should take a break before entering the professional world.

"If you can afford it financially, it would be great to take some time off," she said. "Unfortunately, in most cases, the reality is that you can't do that."

Sanderlin said there are stressrelieving alternatives for the student who must begin to work immediately.

"You can take what I call a mental vacation," she said. "Find things that are relaxing and enjoyable when you do have free time, and take the time to get away from stressful situations whenever possible."

Distressing situations, such as job interviews or first days on the job, can be made less intimidating if one takes a moment to relax before them.

"Take deep, cleansing breaths," she said. "But don't go overboard. You don't want to hyperventilate in someone's office. Just close your eyes and relax."

Cold winter weather is said to be the reason for the famed "Spring Fever" people are afflicted with at the onset of warm days, Sanderlin said.

"During the winter months, there's not a lot of positive reinforcement in a student's life,' she said. "The weather is yucky, and you don't see a lot of

Isolation from people and the dreariness outdoors can be depressing for students. It can add to the already hectic life of the student, making the stress seem overwhelming, Sanderlin said. But burnout doesn't happen just in the spring. Julie Hix, sophomore in preveterinary medicine, took the second half of the fall semester off, citing a heavy workload as the "I didn't plan my schedule very well," Hix said. "I had a lot of hard classes. "I think the stress of studying hard and not eating or sleeping right was making me sick," she said. "I was depressed and pretty bummed about my grades.'

Hix said she realizes now that quitting school helped her regain the momentum to continue toward her degree.

"Quitting school wasn't what I wanted, but it was probably the best thing," she said. "I just needed a little break. I couldn't wait to get back."

Although the idea of temporarily taking leave of one's classes may sound a bit irresponsible, it may actually be the best medicine, Sanderlin said. Students may find they need some time away from their daily routines.

"The key is moderation," she

For some, however, the amount of stress may greatly outweigh the ability to manage and cope with daily schedules, Sanderlin said. For more intense forms of burnout, Sanderlin recommended avoiding extremist thinking that can make the stress seem out of control. Positively labeling the things students deal with by using the word "task," rather than "problem," is also helpful.

"If things start to get overwhelming, break the task down into manageable pieces, so it can be dealt with," Sanderlin said.

For Todd Kivett, junior in engineering technology, breaking up the task and dealing with stress he was under meant taking the spring semester off from school with the intent to return in the Kivett said he felt overwhelmed during the fall with his coursework and burned out from not taking a break.

"Summer school burned me out and left me without summer savings," he said.

When Kivett noticed his grades weren't as good as they had been in the past, he considered taking some time off from school. It was not an easy decision, he said.

"I put most of the pressure on myself," he said. "But after the decision was made, I felt some ment to talk to someone may be the best solution for students who can't find ways to cope with the stress on their own.

Emotional stress can lead to the typical health problems associated with nerves, such as headaches and fatigue, Moeller said.

A subconscious function commonly called the "Fight or Flight Syndrome" takes place in the body, Sanderlin said. In short, this is when one's body prepares to fight or flee from potentially dangerous situations, thus dealing with stress, she said.

In stress management seminars Sanderlin conducts at Lafene, she informs students how to change the way they deal with stress from the "Fight or Flight" approach to relaxation techniques she said are effective for students with all levels of burnout.

Lafene offers biofeedback

Process designed to control stress by monitoring biological responses

By Donna Warren Collegian Reporter

Preparing for job interviews can be a stressful experience, but a service offered at Lafene Student Health Center can help take the edge off nervousness.

People can monitor their biological responses with biofeedback to learn how to control their reactions.

Martha Sanderlin, graduate assistant at University Counseling Services, said people experience various levels of stress when reacting to daily events and worry.

She said when an adaptive response to stress is overused, the body does not have time to return to a normal state between responses, so people need to counteract the negative effects stress have on their bodies.

A person can not be both relaxed and stressed at the same time, Sanderlin said. Biofeedback analysis is a learning process that teaches people how to get in a relaxed state.

Sanderlin uses various machines to monitor different body systems to see which are being affected by the stress. She then teaches numerous techniques to counteract the negative responses.

Biofeedback machines are like mirrors are to dancers," Sanderlin said. "They can show someone what their body is doing and whether or not strategies are working."

She said different machines can measure brainwave frequencies, hand temperatures, blood pressure and muscle tenseness. These are physical components frequently affected "However, the machines cannot correct the problem because biofeedback is a learning situation, and like any learning situation it requires effort and practice," Sanderlin

Sanderlin said many factors are involved in determining how long it will take for someone to become successful in overcoming stress, but most people see results in a couple

Paul Shull, professor emeritus of music, said he has had students work with biofeedback analysis. Shull said the techniques learned in biofeedback are a great way to overcome the stage fright some musicians experience.

"The relaxation techniques are very important in helping some students who are panicstricken at the thought of per-forming in public," Shull said. Shull said he had one student a few years ago who was a "basketcase" when he performed. Shull referred the student to Lafene Student Health Center.

"After undergoing biofeedback analysis, the student learned how to achieve a feeling of inner peace before performing," Shull said, "and this helped him ignore and not worry about the audience so he could concentrate on the performance."

Sanderlin said Lafene is usually working on stress management with about 20 individuals at any given time. About half of the clients are referred from the sports medicine clinic, advisers and physicians. The other 50 percent come in on their own,

Resume planning

Despite format variety, experts recommend conservative designs for the average career

By Angela Tholstrup Collegian Reporter

In 20 to 30 seconds, an interviewer will scan a resume and decide whether to toss it aside or place it in the keep pile. A clean, concise and easy-to-read resume is needed to gain the advantage.

Reading pamphlets and filling out a data sheet will help in the resume writing process, said Bruce Laughlin, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center.

The resume process starts with compiling a list of skills, experiences, goals, strengths, education, and references.

There are several services, pamphlets and books available to help in the process of writing a resume. Most services cost less than $50, while many are free.

There isn't a single best format to follow in writing a resume, according to a pamphlet titled "Writing Your Resume." The presentation is what will make the difference.

Ann Haselhorst, office manager at Graphics Plus, said she recommends using a more conservative

The average college student should use a one-page resume, Haselhorst said, on an off-white, gray or white paper.

"The brighter colors, like melon, will be remembered, but probably not for the content," Haselhorst said.

A resume should be designed so that the prospective employer can read it at a glance, Haselhorst said. The resume also should be organized in a neat manner.

It is important to have white

Tips for better resumes

1. Appearance counts

Investing in typesetting and good quality paper are worth it. Many employers base an opinion on the appearance of the resume alone. The best paper to use? Try a textured offwhite paper.

2. Limit the information
The applicants should stay with one page resumes, only adding another page if # absolutely necessary. 3. Accuracy counts

Not only should the resume itself be neat, but the grammar in the resume should be flawless. There is no excuse for typographical errors here.

space to create the impression of neatness and orderliness, Haselhorst said. Changing the fonts and using bold face type will also help to organize the content.

Long, complex sentences should be avoided, Laughlin said. Short phrases, with action verbs, are preferred.

The student might want to tailor the resume to the profession, Haselhorst said. A resume intended for a business-type profession should be more conservative, while a graphic design major may want to incorporate more creative elements into their presentation.

Some people prefer to have lines and borders around the information, Haselhorst said. This can give the resume a unique graphic look.

A cover letter is often sent with the resume.

"A letter targets the company more specifically while the resume is more general," Haselhorst said. "It pinpoints the interest in the company and sets up possibilities for interviews."

The cover letter should be formatted in the same style as the resume and on the same paper, according to one pamphlet. The cover letter should be three or four paragraphs long, carefully edited for misspellings or grammatical errors.

The cover letters and resumes can be mailed in matching envelopes or in manilla envelopes, Haselhorst said. The mailing format depends on whether special graphics are used.

"If the person went to lot of work to do graphics, they wouldn't want it to arrive with crinkles and creases," Haselhorst

Some people use videotapes as resumes, but Haselhorst and Laughlin said they do not believe the tapes will replace the paper resume.

Videotapes are used more for visual occupations, like sales representatives, public relations or television jobs, Haselhorst said.

"The videotapes may help show the students," Laughlin said, "(although) employers like to see the people in the flesh."

Professor outlines mediocre culture

Michael Finnegan, professor of anthropology, delivers his lecture at the Arts and Sciences Council Last Lecture Series Tuesday evening in the K-State Union Little Theater. Finnegan's lecture centered on his views of the mediocrity in the college community.

Finnegan points out defiencies in media, education at Last Lecture

By Gregory A. Branson Collegian Reporter

An education is only as good as the student, said Michael Finnegan, professor of anthropology, at the Last Lecture Tuesday night.

Finnegan's lecture, "The Cult of Mediocrity" was sponsored by the Arts and Sciences Council. He pointed out instances in which mediocrity in our culture has caused deficiencies in education, the media, and other aspects of our society.

In education, Finnegan said some students don't use the opportunities given to them and try to take too many short cuts. Because of this, he said hard-working students at K-State can receive a better education than some students who attend more prestigious universities, such as Harvard University.

One of the keys to not being mediocre at school and in life is to check everything out, and not take anything for granted.

'When we read something in a book, we have to check it out," Finnegan said. "In God we trust. Everything else we check out."

Finnegan told the story of a student trying to receive his doctoral degree from the College of Education. He said he was on the research committee that challenged the student's dissertation.

Finnegan said several of his stories were from a magazine called Education Digest.

"I found out Education Digest was a second fiddle to Reader's Digest," Finnegan said. "If the guy was bright, he would have noticed that Education Digest prints the names of all the sources originally used in their articles."

Finnegan told other members of the committee what he had discovered, however the student was awarded his degree anyway. He said this exemplified mediocrity in both the student and the other members of the committee.

"People are a product of the environment," he said.

Finnegan used the Chicago fire as an example of media mediocrity. On Oct. 8, 1871, a fire started in Chicago. It burned for several days and 250 people were killed.

On the same day a forest fire swept through the city of Pestigo, Wisc., and killed 1,182 people out of a population of about 2,000, he said.

"Why do we remember the 250 individuals in the Chicago fire and not the 1,182 in Wisconsin fire? Because of the media," Finnegan said.

He said the lack of a large newspaper in rural Wisconsin compared to the several newspapers of Chicago resulted in the Chicago fire being written into history.

"Mediocrity has been around for centuries," Finnegan said, "But it becomes more apparent every now and then."

contamination

Officials say groundwater not threatened by chemicals

By Robert Short Special Projects Editor

Results of tests performed on a plot of contaminated soil near the Kansas River bridge show unacceptable levels of some petroleum-based chemicals.

However county officials say residents in the area are not in danger of having their wells contaminated.

One resident expressed concern that she and other nearby residents may have to have their wells tested.

There are a lot of people out here who can't afford that," said Katie Smith, a resident of Fairmont community, a residential area near the site of the contaminated soil.

"I don't want these people out here hurt," she said.

The contaminated area, northeast of the Kansas River bridge, is the site of an abandoned concrete production plant. Riley County purchased the plot and began a cleanup of the area earlier this month, with the focal point of their concern being contamination from an underground fuel storage tank.

Monty Wedel, Riley County director of zoning and planning, said the extent of the contamination has clear parameters. Test results showed the contamination extends about 30 feet southwest of the tank.

"I have no reason to believe anyone is in danger," Wedel said. "It is not a bad idea for anyone to get their wells tested, but that doesn't mean everyone should rush out and get their water tested."

J.C. Butler Associates, Inc., a private consulting firm hired out of Salina, conducted a series of tests to determine which chemicals were present in the soil surrounding the tank and the extent of the contamination.

Butler Associates collected soil samples Jan. 10 and had them tested for benzene, toluene and xylene - all common gasoline constituents. Four soil samples were submitted to testing by Continental Analytical Services, Inc., an affiliate of Butler Associates.

Two of the soil samples contained levels of total petroleum hydrocarbons which exceeded the maximum contaminant levels allowed by the state. Total petroleum hydrocarbons is a category that encompasses several hydrocarbons rather than individual chemicals. The limit, according to state law, is 100 milligrams per kilogram.

A soil sample taken south of the buried tank tested at 195 mg/kg of total petroleum hydrocarbons, according to Butler Associates' report. The sample taken on the west side of the tank measured 120 mg/kg total petroleum hydrocarbons.

A sampling of water taken south of the tank showed contamination levels of xylene well above Kansas Action Level. A KAL, which is set for each category of chemical, represents the maximum allowable level of contamination in groundwater. Xylene was measured at 6,000 parts per billion, while the maximum level allowed in Kansas is

"This far exceeds the KAL set for xylene," according to Butler Associates.

Benzene was also discovered at a level of 7.5 ppb south of the tank. The KAL for benzene is 5

A soil remediation program for the area included removing the soil from the tank site and allowing it to aerate naturally.

The Kansas Department of Health and Environment was contacted after a county worker was overcome by fumes while removing soil from the area April 6.

Wedel said benzene was discovered in his blood after tests were performed to find the cause of his unconsciousness.

The site may be used for a new bridge or as a park for residents of Fairmont community.

Testing shows Alcohol policy under study

By Jan Puls Collegian Reporter

A resolution to allow students to consume alcohol in the stadium parking lot before home football games will have its first reading before Student Senate Thursday.

The resolution, sponsored by the Athletic Ticket Sales Committee, is a promotional attempt to increase student football ticket sales, said Bill Nelson, chairman of the committee and author of the resolution.

The resolution calls for Senate to recommend an amendment to the University alcohol policy that would allow alcohol consumption in the southeast corner of the stadium parking lot.

'We want to get more people out to the games and get people excited about football," said David McIntyre, engineering senator and senior in electrical engineering.

Students who are 21 usually go to Aggieville to drink and then drive to the game, McIntyre said. Allowing 3.2 beer in the parking lot would alleviate some of the drinking and driving.

Under the resolution, the southeast corner of the parking lot would be roped off to limit the access of people and vehicles. The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics would provide security to check identification and monitor the area for underage drinking. In order to limit drinking and driving, vehicles would be forbidden to leave the area until the start of the fourth quarter, Nelson said. This would give people time to sober up during the game before driving home.

The athletic department is in favor of the proposal, because they think it will bring more people out to the game, Nelson said.

The University alcohol policy currently allows alumni to consume al-side of the stadium, Nelson said.

The policy also allows pregame drinking in the football office Big Eight room and the Legends room in Bramlage Coliseum.

"We're not advocating that students need to drink or must drink before the games," McIntyre said. "If the alumni are mixing drinks just across the parking lot, I see no reason why students that are 21 and older shouldn't be able to drink as well." If the resolution is passed by Senate, it would have to be approved by University administrators and the

Graduate helped engineer Hubble Space Telescope

By Clinton Wolf Staff Reporter

Not many K-State alumni get to see their work in orbit less than two years after graduation. But Tuesday's launch of Space Shuttle Discovery has done just that for 1988 graduate Joe Naab.

Naab, who received his masters degree in electrical engineering, has been working on the Hubble Space Telescope, scheduled to be placed in orbit by the space shuttle today.

The launch was originally set for April 10, but was canceled due to a malfunction in one of the shuttle's auxiliary power units.

Naab is a computer engineer at Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt, Md., where the telescope was developed. The center is just outside of Washington, D.C.

"Not many people work out here," Naab said. "It's a cool job. I like it a Naab said he has worked on modifying software for the computer that controls the wide-field, planetary camera. According to NASA literature, the camera can make images of swaths of the universe for mapping distant galaxies or, in one exposure, can photograph the entire face of any planet except Mercury, which is too close to the sun.

Donald Lenhert, professor in electrical and computer engineering and Naab's major professor during his graduate study, said Naab was a good programmer and needed little

"He was a non-conventional student," Lenhert said. "He didn't do things like everybody else did." Lenhert said that one time, Naab believed one of his required classes was unnecessary and wrote comments expressing this view on the final exam. '(Naab) had to retake the course, but he got his protest in," Lenhert said. "Later, he decided that probably wasn't the proper place to make his protest.

Naab said working at Goddard isn't his first space program experience. A chance look at job offerings in Holtz Hall during his junior year prompted Naab to write Kennedy Space Center, requesting a summer internship.

"Kennedy said they had a job if I wanted it," he said. He worked there as a computer technician that summer and then returned to the University. Naab said after graduating with his masters degree, he sent resumes to various space agencies, but Goddard was the first to respond. Although his work at Goddard is unique, Naab said it's not that difficult for graduates to find the job they

"You've just got to look for it," he said. "It's surprisingly easy to pick around and get the job you want." Lenhert said he was pleased to hear about Naab's work.

"I think it's great he's got it, because he was uncertain what he would be working on when he started," Lenhert said.

Lenhert said it is not unusual for students to go directly from the University into positions such as Naab's. "We kind of take it in stride and expect it of our students," Lenhert said. "Our (students) do very well." While some projects at Goddard may not be completed for years, Naab said he was fortunate to work on one which was launched a year and a half after he began. "I know back when I was a junior I wanted to work in space," he said. "K-State's a good school, and I didn't have (any problem) dropping into work here.'

Naab said since joining Goddard, he has worked continuously with the telescope.

"That's all I have done," he said, laughing.

One of the outstanding features of the telescope is that it will allow astronomers to see 10 times farther than before, Naab said. This will not only make it possible to see celestial objects more clearly, but it will allow scientists to actually look back in "Light only travels so fast," he said. "If you look far enough away, you can see back in time, to the beginning of the universe and beyond." Naab said the launch delay didn't bother him and his co-workers. "It's been so long, I don't know if two weeks matters," he said. "We've been waiting four years now, so two weeks is kind of a drop in the bucket."

Shuttle carries payload skyward

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. Seven years late, the Hubble Space Telescope is where it belongs, out of this world and in search of others so distant that they may have been formed at the beginning of time.

Less than five hours after it rode into space aboard the shuttle Discovery on Tuesday, the $1.5 billion telescope sent its first test radio signal. At the sign of life, applause and cheers erupted in Mission Control in Houston.

"As near as we can tell, everything looks perfect," said astronaut Steve Hawley from the shuttle. Hawley's job on Wednesday will be to drop the telescope overboard for a 15-year stay in space.

Discovery, trailing an arc of white smoke into a brilliant blue sky, carried the silvercolored telescope to an orbit 380 miles above Earth higher by 70 miles than any previous shuttle. There the Hubble will stay to search for yet-unseen wonders of creation with instruments that can look 14 billion years backward in time.

Experts examine hostage case

WIESBADEN, West Germany (AP) - Robert Polhill was likely kept in the same building as other Western hostages in Lebanon, and intelligence experts can pinpoint where they were held in Beirut, U.S. officials said Tuesday.

Earlier Tuesday, Col. Kenneth Koskinen, medical director at the U.S. Air Force hospital in Wiesbaden, said Polhill's anger at his captors and strong sense of humor helped keep him sane.

Polhill, 55, was reunited Tuesday with his two sons for the first time in more than three years. They shared a lunch of spare ribs in Polhill's hospital suite, serenaded by a German accordionist.

In Beirut, the newspaper An-Nahar said pro-Iranian kidnappers will not free any of the remaining seven American hostages unless Israel releases Arab prisoners. After Polhill's release Sunday there were reports from Lebanon that a second hostage release was in the offing.

But it was made clear kidnappers wanted a show of reciprocity from Washington. The U.S. administration has said it made no deal for Polhill's release and will exchange nothing for the hostages.

Bush refrains from sanctions

WASHINGTON (AP) - President Bush held off Tuesday on sanctions against the Soviet Union for its crackdown on Lithuania, saying he wanted to avoid any steps that would set back the progress that has been made in Eastern Europe.

Bush said any actions that might be taken would most likely be on the economic side but would not include a grain

"I'm concerned that we not inadvertently do something that compels the Soviet Union to take action that would set back the whole case of freedom around the world," Bush said after a meeting with congressional leaders.

Later, he told members of the Associated General Contractors at a White House meeting, "I don't want to do something that would inadvertently set back the progress that has been made in Eastern Europe.

Shortly after Bush spoke, President Vytautas Landsbergis of Lithuania issued an angry statement saying, "Can the freedom of one group of people be sold for the freedom of another? What then is the idea of freedom itself?"

"This is another Munich," Landsbergis declared, referring to the 1938 pact in which France and Britain allowed Germany to take control of Czechoslovakia.

Financier guilty of tax crimes

NEW YORK (AP) - Michael Milken, the billionaire financier who reshaped Wall Street in the 1980s but fell in its biggest scandal, tearfully pleaded guilty Tuesday to breaking federal securities and tax laws. He agreed to pay a record $600 million in penalties.

Milken, 43, broke down before the packed Manhattan courtroom as he finished a lengthy statement outlining his crimes, which included illegal trading with stock speculator Ivan Boesky and others from 1984-86.

"I realize by my acts I have hurt those who are closest to me. I am truly sorry," Milken said. He had to be supported by his attorney and his voice cracked when he pleaded, "Guilty, your honor."

Milken faces a maximum 28 years in prison at his scheduled Oct. 1 sentencing before U.S. District Judge Kimba Wood, although legal experts expect a term of around five years.

The plea marked a stunning victory in the government's crackdown on Wall Street crime that already included more than 30 convictions and targeted Milken and his former employer, Drexel Burnham Lambert Inc., from its outset in 1986.

Lawmakers to buy computers

TOPEKA (AP) - Legislative leaders Tuesday endorsed a proposal to spend $905,000 over the next two budget years to buy a new computer system to help lawmakers in redrawing their legislative districts for the 1992 elections.

The Legislative Coordinating Council voted 6-1 to ask the House and Senate budget committees to endorse the proposal, which calls for spending $559,676 in the fiscal year that begins July 1 and an additional $345,096 in budget year 1992.

Only Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, voted against the plan. He said he thought it was too expensive, and just as good a reapportionment could be achieved using a less complicated computer system.

Under the state constitution, the Legislature will have to reapportion itself in 1992, using 1990 federal census figures adjusted to state requirements. Those include that students are counted back in their home towns and most military personnel are not counted as Kansas residents.

Measles outbreak to cost state

TOPEKA (AP) - A state Department of Health and Environment spokesman said Tuesday that officials are unsure how much the Kansas measles outbreak will cost the state.

"It's cause for concern," said Greg Crawford, the agency's director of public information. "But at this particular point, we are trying to make sure we can keep on top of this outbreak." Crawford said the agency had already given 19,000 vaccinations since mid-February at a cost of $14.71 each. Some of that money will be reimbursed from an emergency fund distributed by the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control, but Kansas officials don't know how much, he said.

Condoms topic for Union panel

Discussion intends to evaluate need for vending machines at University

By The Collegian Staff

Lafene Student Health Center is sponsoring a panel discussion at noon today in the K-State Union Courtyard on whether to install condom vending machines in campus

The debate is part of K-State's Condom Sense Week.

Panelists for the discussion will include Cindy Burke, health educator at Lafene; Besty Bergen, associate professor of human development and family studies; Dave Haden, director of Haymaker Hall; Dr. Larry Moeller, chief of staff at Lafene; and Monica Connet, senior in elementary education and a student senator.

Lafene is administering surveys to students in an effort to determine how many machines would be needed and where they would be

The survey lists Ahearn Fieldhouse, the Union, Lafene, fraternities and sororities and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex as possible locations. The survey also includes a space for students to suggest other possible areas for condom machine

Questions on the survey include age, sex, use of condoms, where condoms are purchased and by whom, if students would prefer to have condom machines on campus and where, and how they think the presence of condom machines will affect K-State's image. More than 400 surveys have been completed and returned to Lafene.

University administrators have said they will not put condom machines on campus unless students want them there, Burke said. The information gathered in the surveys and at the panel debate will be presented to the administration, she said.

Lafene is also administering a petition to determine if there is support for installing the machines.

If the students support placement of condom machines on campus, and the administration backs that support, then the placement of individual machines may begin. Each individual location on campus will have the choice to either accept or deny placement of the machines on their premises. Lafene will only be able to recommend possible locations.

The surveys and the petition are available at an information table in

Holocaust drama depicts true tale of child survivor

By Amy D. Hadlock Collegian Reporter

Through a child's eyes, Yonat Klar helps teach people about the suffering endured by thousands during the Holocaust.

Klar, an Israeli storyteller, pre-sented the one-person play, "Child-hood," Tuesday night at the International Student Center.

The play was adapted from the book "Childhood" by Jona Oberski, a survivor of the Holocaust. The book is the true story of a 6-year-old Jewish boy named Jona whose family was abducted one night and sent to Bergen-Belsen death camp.

The Holocaust Remembrance was sponsored by the University Committee on Religion and the Manhattan Association of Christian and Jewish Congregations.

"We wanted to have Klar tell the story, to serve as a remembrence of the Holocaust and also as a committment of ourselves to prevent something like this from ever happening again," said David Margolies, adviser of the Jewish Student Group and assistant professor of entomology Klar said she performs the dramatization to make other people aware of the Holocaust.

"The dramatizaton was done from the eyes of a 6-year-old boy because a child strips away all politics, and it is more pure," she said. "I first started this performance because I am a daughter of Holocaust survivors, and then I decided also to do it after my first child was born, because it made me think about how I would feel if it had been me and my child."

Members of the audience participated in a discussion after the dramatization.

"After seeing Klar's performance, it helped me to realize how precious life is," said Tony Williams, graduate student in education.

"After the performance was over, no one could talk," Margolies said. "It was hard to say anything. I was moved not by the deaths so much, but for the people who had to live through the Holocaust and then try to go on with life. I think it would be hard to have faith in other people."

The discussion was followed by a traditional interfaith candlelight ceremony.

The ceremony consisted of people from different religions reading passages and served as a remembrance for the Holocaust victims. The ceremony was also dedicated to those involved in violence in countries including Cambodia, Central America, Northern Ireland, Israel and South Africa.

Margolies said this was the fourth year the Jewish Student Group has sponsored a remembrance

"In past years we have had services, ceremonies, speakers, survivors of the Holocaust and liberators,"

Klar lives in Lawrence this year and will return to Israel in July.

Germanys to unify on July

Economic, social union agreed upon; joint political parties under discussion

By The Associated Press

BONN, West Germany . Chancellor Helmut Kohl and East German Prime Minister Lothar de Maiziere on Tuesday named July 2 as the day for economic and social union of the two Germanys, a West German spokesman said.

Union in those areas will bring the divided nation a long way toward full unification after more than four decades of separation following the horror of the Nazi dictatorship and defeat in World War II.

The issue of political union, or holding an election to form a single government, remains to be worked

Secretary of State James Baker III and Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze, joined by their colleagues from Britain, France and the two German states, are scheduled to meet in Bonn on May 5. They will try to resolve difficult international aspects of unification, including Germany's future military stance. While early July has frequently been mentioned as a goal for economic, monetary and social union meaning the coordination of social benefits, such as unemployment and old age pensions — Tuesday's statement was the first confirmation of a specific target date.

Delegations from both Germanys are to meet in East Berlin on Wednesday to negotiate over how to best introduce the powerhouse West German mark into East Germay's battered economy.

The basis of the talks will be Bonn's proposal for monetary union, which calls for a basic 1-1 exchange rate of East German marks for West marks for wages, salaries and pensions in East Germany.

The announcements, made by West German government spokesman Dieter Vogel, followed three hours of private talks between Kohl and de Maiziere. De Maiziere was visiting Bonn for the first time as East Germany's prime minister.

Vogel said Kohl and de Maiziere spoke in a friendly atmosphere. De Maiziere, talking to reporters after the meeting, was asked whether he had accepted the West German government's latest proposal for monetary union.

"There was nothing for me to accept. The chancellor presented the government's suggestions, and we'll negotiate about them," de Maiziere

He said hammering out a monetary union would require many talks and negotiations.

. The West German monetary union proposal, announced Monday, represented a surprising concession to East German demands. East Germans had feared that the exchange rate would be one West German mark for two East German marks a rate that was initially proposed by West Germany's central bank.

The 1-1 rate will be limited, how-

New farm program must be devised

Cuts. As we all know by now, it is 1990, and that means it is time for Congress to vote on a new farm bill.

The current program is up for a five-year renewal, but it's that voting time of year, when our elected officials are supposed to decide whether to keep subsidizing American agricultural products. Now, these subsidies won't help the big guys, right Mr. Congressman? But will these payments really help the small independent producer? And will they help cover production costs? I have yet to see an agriculture subsidy program that will do all that. Subsidizing producers will not raise the market price for agriculture products. Higher prices that will at least let farmers them bankruptcy.

The current farm program is a disaster and congress wants to renew the same plan for five more years. The system has caused nothing but complete chaos in the farming inmarkets are unlocked and our grain is sold to in the right place.

ood Evening, and welcome to this anyone who wants to buy it, not just to counweek's edition of Congressional tries we feel like dealing with, not much is going to change. The huge grain surplus, which still exists, keeps market prices shamefully low. Although opening up new foreign markets means American farmers must undersell competitiors, moving the grain, even at a lower price, is the only way to deplete the suplus and keep price up for producers in the long run.

What? The taxpayers are tired of supporting farm subsidies? They're tired of forking out $20 billion in taxes and another $10 billion for price hikes? I can't imagine why. But let's keep in mind farmers are still tax payers and are paying the same high food prices as everybody else.

The average grain farmer only sees about break even is the only thing that will save five to seven cents for every dollar the consumer spends. The middle men are taking home your hard earned cash, not the producers. All the people that handle the grain between the harvest field and the grocery cart are cashing in. They rob grain at rock bottom dustry. The government can subsidize all the prices and give comsumers the shaft with a farm products it wants to, but until foreign retail markup. So let's at least put the blame

-COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

Are automakers, companies that manufacture computers or oil companies forced to cut production by the government? No. Each year farmers are forced to take about 61 million acres out of production by putting a percentage of their land in "The Program." Putting land in "The Program" means those acres are taken out of any type of crop production for a minimum of one full year. The original idea of taking land out of production was to help diminish the grain surplus to raise market prices. This hasn't happened yet; farmers are still operating at a loss.

The price of wheat averages $3 a bushel, that's about same price it was in 1970. Production costs have almost doubled. So the government subsidies are now nothing more than petty cash for the average farmer. This program has forced farmers to become dependent on these payments and it has not moved farmers any closer to the financial independence they once knew.

resident Bush says he wants to cut farm spending by $1.5 billion, and give producers more flexibility. Well, let's get to it. In January, Bush spoke and the National Farm Bureau in Orlando but offered farmers little hope for a new or more efficient government program.

The problem now does not come from the farmers themselves, but from too much government control. All foriegn markets must be opened and farmers must be able to undersell Argentina, Brazil and other grain producing countries. All these restraints are not only ruining our farmers but also forcing consumers at the grocery store to pay higher prices for poorer selection. Importing inferior produce and grain products must also be stopped.

A recent editorial in USA Today argued against farm subsidies. It said the government doesn't subsidize other major industries and that farmers shouldn't be supported by the government. A survey conducted by USA Today also indicates that most Americans recognize the farmers' plight, but they still feel it's the farmers' own tough luck if they can't turn a profit.

Many say the day of the family farm is over. The world today is just too big, and too corporate for the family farms to survive. If the way of world calls for only large corporate farms, then let it be. Kansas is ranked third in the nation in grain exports behind Nebraska and California, which takes the top spot in the ag-exports. These figures illustrate the vital role small producers still play because agriculture in Kansas and Nebraska comes primarily from the smaller, family

A new farm program must be devised that will open foreign markets, deplete grain surpluses, lower the burden for tax payers and, above all, raise maket price for agricultural products.

ROTC should admit homosexuals or disband

armed forces have, at times, prevented some Americans from serving their country, as America itself prevented those same people from receiving their full politcal and legal rights.

But, as America has grown in understanding of the many ways of being human, so too has the military changed.

Again America is learning. It is beginning to realize that gays and lesbians are human and deserve their rights. The time has come for the military to change.

The armed forces and ROTC programs must begin accepting homosexuals.

The military has long resisted this change because it claims the presence of homosexuals in military units harms morale and presents a security risk.

The only reason gays and lesbians may pose a security risk is that they must keep their sexual orientation a secret to continue in their chosen professions. A spy who discovers their sexual orientation may then blackmail them into

As a product of the nation, the providing secrets. By accepting homosexuals, the military would eliminate that security risk.

> The issue of their presence creating a morale problem seems to be based on the idea that gays and lesbians are mentally unstable. In other words, the military is needlessly afraid gays and lesbians would be unable to restrain themselves in a shower full of others of the same sex. This is obviously not based on any facts.

> If an American soldier trained in hand-to-hand combat suddenly loses the ability to fight when faced by a homosexual, the Soviets would long ago have filled the Red Army with gays and lesbians to overrun Western Europe.

> K-State should work to change this policy - it promotes discrimination on campus. The University should demand that changes begin immediately, as have other universities. K-State should do away with ROTC until the Pentagon realizes gays and lesbians are entitled to the same rights as all Americans and treats them accordingly.

High court decision violates Indians' rights

dian culture takes up many chapters in our history books. The U.S. Supreme Court has just added a footnote to the list of damages done against the first Americans.

The use of peyote, a mild halucinogen used for centuries by American Indians for religious ceremonies, can now be outlawed by state legislatures.

The case originated in Oregon over a dispute about whether to pay unemployment benefits to two fired drug counselors who took small amounts of peyote during an Indian religious ceremony.

The Supreme Court justices who their cultural activities. supported the decision said individuals' religious beliefs do not excuse them from compliance with an otherwise valid law. Justice Antonin Scalia said it would be courting anarchy to let a few do what is illegal for everyone else.

American Indians are exempt from paying certain categories of property taxes. This also could be considered an allowance that is illegal for everyone else.

Contrary to what Scalia and the other five justices who supported the decision say, American Indians have every right to continue their religous ceremonies as long as they choose. The Supreme Court has no right to tell the American Indians what they can and cannot do in

The dissenting justices in the case called the decision an act of religious oppression toward the American Indian. This is an accurate description of the decision. It is now up to the states to allow the use of peyote and hopefully preserve This line of reasoning seems an intregal part of American Indian

It's like a three-legged dog I recently watched. He didn't even seem to know that a leg was missing. The same park that housed the threelegged dog, housed me. On my back, I looked up and saw all white, soft clouds, and forgot that I wasn't in a padded, white-walled room. I felt safe for once. My heartbeat slowed. I breathed in air that tasted of sustenance.

How I hate the beginning of an end. If I could draw, I would paint spots over the pain and wait until later to roll over this splotchy skin, which eventually grows rough and aged and longs to be scrubbed. I would roll over the spots until I was a transparent sheen, as transparent as the pie crust skin my grandmother would perfect.

Is this why I can't allow scabs to exist? I tear the top off and watch myself bleed. This is all that keeps me wanting to be alive sometimes, that ache that comes with each breath, breathing in the smell of my charred flesh, seared by constant curiosity with the fever that will eventually take me,

But for now I limp, a three-legged dog, still an impatient toddler. I mumble the language does anyone understand anyone? Do we communicate or just babble? When I heard the death of a rabbit, lost in the street of big tires and exhaust, I understood that. I understood that screech that told me I will screech

I understand hunger and fear and loss. I don't know where happiness is. I know the lack of it, for when I am full, I am always waiting to be emptied and empty.

When I was younger, we had a horsetank. Mom would stick the hose in it, and I would watch it fill. The splash and the displacement of water was equal to my body. I felt renewed as the water overflowed the boundaries, seeping into cracks to feed the weeds that found themselves there.

I spent a summer writing the memories of a woman who can't stop moving. Her fingers, her head and her body moved without intention, and so she spoke and I wrote. Inside she moved like fluid. The quivering shell I wished each day to stop and fall from her, so that I could speak to the woman beneath. But, as I listened, I found her. I found that she moved just as the dog, without difficulty. She had forgotten that her steadiness had been taken away, and so she moved through words and thoughts and feelings as the dog would gallop, fall and rebound.

Scars may remind me of my physical clumsiness, but too often the emotional scars I seem to continue to wound, again and again just as I tear scabs from my skin. One of the hazards of living is the pain and the snagging of memories.

As someone once said, "Pain makes humans think; thinking makes humans wise; and wisdom helps humans to accept the pain." It seems that the three-legged dog was wise and accepting. And the woman who can't stop moving, it was difficult for me to look behind the grotesque shell. Not until I rested my eyes on her and listened, did I understand and accept. Not until then did I understand that we all are maimed, and many times this is all that is real, and resilient about

"When I first started here I didn't know anything about food service," he said. "I learned it all hands-on. Actually, I'm still learning."

Anderson said he enjoys his job, and he and his coworkers get along "famously." Some of the best moments he has are shared on the job with his coworkers.

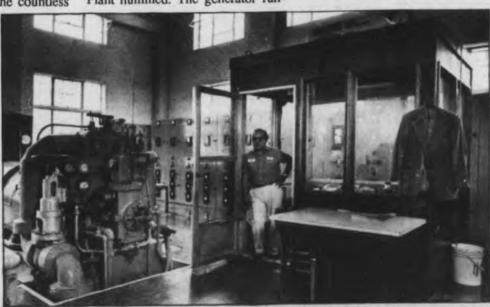

"We get along pretty well, like a family," Anderson said. "But, you know, every job has its ups and downs.

"It all comes down to teamwork. If you don't have teamwork, you can't get anything done. I mean, you can get the job done, but it slows you down. If you can work in unity, everything can work out. There's a lot people can learn from each other."

"That bell there tells when the water pressure dips down too low," said Mike Amaro, power plant operator. "It usually goes off when the kids get out of class and go to the bathroom and flush the toilets.

"I've always wondered what would happen if everyone would get together and flush them at the same time"

It's his job to supervise the power readings for the output of the generator between 6 a.m. and 2 p.m. If the readings are too high or too low, he makes the necessary adjustments. The rest of the time, Amaro said, he sits in his glass cubicle and listens to the radio.

Slugfest ends in 'Cats victory, 18-14

By Dan Wicker Sports Reporter

The scorebooks read 5-2 K-State. And that was only in the home run

It was a baseball show of power Tucsday at Frank Myers Field as K-State won a 18-14 slugfest over the 25th-ranked Creighton Bluejays.

"It was an offensive day. You should score runs on a day like this," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "We did a lot of nice things and were taking some real aggressive cuts."

The Wildcats, who bounced back from their first Big Eight series loss of the season to Iowa State last weekend, moved to 24-17 on the season. Creighton's loss dropped them to 34-14.

It was a game that wasn't pretty for either pitching staff. K-State went to the bullpen four times, and Creighton made use of five pitchers. The high gusts of wind did not do the pitchers any favors, as K-State scored in every inning except two, and Creighton crossed the plate in five innings.

"It was a tough day to pitch, but you can't help that. We let them back into the game with bases on balls," Clark said. "With a ranked team, or any team, you can't afford to do that. It's just inviting danger."

The pitching was Clark's main concern, who said the pitching staff needs to fine tune and return to square one. Dan Skala abruptly ended the pitchers' worry and Creighton's ninth inning, two-out rally by picking off Steve Hinton.

"What's happened to our pitching staff, I don't know. We have let our concentration go elsewhere. We only had one error, but we just didn't execute off the hill," Clark said. "I think the play of the game was Dan throwing them out, because heck, I don't know whether we would have stopped them or not."

K-State and Creighton came out in the first inning showing the game the first inning, the score was 3-2 K- season. He promptly hit the first pitch We are getting our people on in front rest of the game.

"Wilson stepped up and did a great job in the four hole. He has been swinging a great bat lately," Clark said. "He has been hitting the ball hard.

The game teeter-tottered the first three innings until the 'Cats put together a five-run bottom of the third. Wilson and Blair Hanneman both homered to take care of three of the runs. K-State went up by a tally of 9-5 and maintained the lead for the

This type of inning helped K-State notch its highest run total and most hits (20) in one game this season.

"We are swinging the bats better and better. I think the warm weather has something to do with it, and of course the wind doesn't hurt the offense," Clark said. "We are doing some good things up at the plate May 4.

Climate to face changes

Speaker says greenhouse effect may vary sea levels

By Angela Tholstrup Collegian Reporter

Parts of Florida, Texas and the arable land in Egypt could be covered by water as the sea level rises as a consequence of the greenhouse

Temperature and precipitation are also expected to change as the carbon dioxide levels build up in the atmosphere, said Clenton Owensby, professor of agronomy.

Owensby spoke Tuesday in Union Little Theatre about the greenhouse effect as a part of the Earth Week 1990 lecture series sponsored by Students Acting to Save a Vulnerable Environment.

"The greenhouse effect is not something new," Owensby said. "It's been predicted for the last 30 years."

Research on the effects on the global climate has increased in the past 15 years, he said. The global climate changes are a result of the earth's radiation reflecting back to the Earth.

Twenty-five percent of the sun's radiation is absorbed by the earth's cloud cover, Owensby said, and 50 percent of the sun's radiation reaches the surface of the earth. The earth's surface reflects 5 percent and absorbs the remainder because of the layer of gases called the greenhouse gases.

The greenhouse effect is caused by the earth's radiation being reflected back to the surface by greenhouse gases. The gas layer consists of carbon dioxide, chloroflourocarbons, methane, nitrous oxide and ozone.

Without the greenhouse gas layer, the earth would be very cold, Owensby said.

"A billion years ago, the earth had a substantially higher carbon dioxide level," he said, "but the sun's radiation output was less.'

As the sun's radiation increased, plants evolved to absorb the energy. But the earth doesn't adapt at the same rate as the increase of gases in the greenhouse layer, Owensby said. The accelerated rate of carbon dioxide is caused by burning fossil fuels and biomasses, such as the rain forests.

The global consequences will bring changes in climate and sea level. The temperature for Manhattan is expected to eventually increase 5 to 9 degrees Fahrenheit with an accompanying reduction of precipitation of 9 to 10 inches.

Lecturer says global warming to cause hot, dry state climate

By Monica Marcotte Collegian Reporter

The future looks hot and dry for Kansas.

Tim Seastedt, associate professor of biology, discussed global warming and its effect on Kansas Tuesday afternoon in the K-State Union Little Theatre. Seastedt's lecture, titled "Climate Change ... A Kansas Perspective," was part of the Earth Week 1990 lecture series sponsored by Students Acting to Save a Vulnerable Environment.

Seastedt looked at global warming, also known as the greenhouse effect, from the perspective of an

"Our land management practices are affecting the local climate," he said. "It is possible to use land management in a way that could slow warming trends."

Management practices that will have to be modified in response to climate change include burning and overgrazing, Seastedt said. Burning, once a beneficial activity in the tallgrass prairie, will cease to be a useful management tool. Overgrazing will quickly convert the tallgrass to a less robust, less productive grassland. Kansas is covered by a grassland biome characterized by tallgrass prairie, he said. A biome is an entire community of living organisms in a single major ecological area.

The Flinthills are part of the eastern edge of the biome and one of the few areas to remain farmland.

The effects of modest global warming in Kansas parallel those documented by studies conducted during the dust bowl of the 1930's, he

Clients experience past lives under regression

Awareness state may enable people to overcome phobias, recognize patterns

By Julie Andsager

Lonnie Catlin can take his clients back in time. Some go back 20 years, some 100 years, some eons.

His clients visit their previous lives through regression, a state of awareness achieved through extreme relaxation and breathing techniques.

Catlin, who conducts regressions at Kindred Spirits Book Store, estimates he has regressed more than 75 people. Of those, he said 80 percent have gone into a past life.

Catlin started experimenting with regression two years ago while attending school in Colorado to learn hypnosis. Once he realized regression could help people, he began doing it professionally.

"There've been a lot of people I can honestly say I've helped through some real strong phobias and fears fears of guns — by going back and realizing they were murdered in wars or by intruders or whatever," he said. "People that have been abusers of drugs and alcohol have gone back and realized that it's been consistent in other lifetimes."

Regression is a more self-directed situation than hypnosis, Catlin said. In hypnosis, the hypnotist tells the client what to see, but in regression, the client sees what he or she needs to see without being told.

"Sometimes what happens is nothing," he said. "They don't experience anything from this life; they don't even relax. It just depends on where they are, as far as if they're scared. If they're real anxious, usually I work with them two or three times so they can be open and accepting of what's happening. 'Sometimes they relax, and no memories come," Catlin said. "When that happens, I'll ask them to ask themselves if they're ready to experience whatever it is that they're going to experience as a memory. I've had a couple of people who said they saw big lights, and their mind said, 'No, not yet.' If it's just their subconscious mind protecting them, I'm not sure

During regression, people are still aware of who and where they are. Pictures of past experiences come in realize the regression is working.

"A person doesn't lose control with who they are when they're hypnotized, so it's real hard to distinguish - with what the media and TV hypnotists have done with hypnosis it's real hard to explain to a person that 'You're hypnotized, even though you don't think you are. Your subconscious mind is open and accepting, even though you don't think it is," Catlin said. Some clients remain in this lifetime. Catlin said a client's mind will take him or her to a time that needs to be remembered. He said people often have blocked out painful memories from this life, which must be dealt with before moving backward further.

"Usually what happens when we do a past-life regression is you start to recognize patterns - consistent flashes, not continuously as in a film. patterns - like there might be a cer-This makes it difficult for a client to tain way you are killed or die each lifetime, and you need to see the pattern," he said.

Recognizing similarities helps clients to find answers to situations or problems they may not understand.

"I'm not saying it's the cure, but once you're aware that that's a possibility — even if it's not reality, even if it's fiction or made-up imagination - it's something for them to believe. It's something for them to focus on and try and make some changes out of knowing possibilities."

Although regression can help people realize what problems they may be fighting subconsciously, Catlin said it may not be enough to deal with serious problems.

"Usually once a person can focus on exactly what it is that occurred that created the problem in the first place, they at least have a point to work from," he said. "I would highly recommend each and every person that does do that to continue to seek counseling of some kind - psychotherapy or psychiatry or whatever.

Catlin's personal experiences and what he has seen when conducting regressions with others have led him to believe in the validity of past-life regression. He said skeptical people often leave with a different attitude.

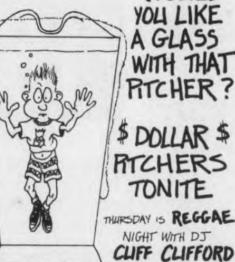

"Typically, when a person experiences the death of someone close in the family or their own death or something that's traumatic in some way, the emotion is so quick to move to the surface and happens so spontaneously that that validates (the regression) for the person, especially if it's a real fearful situation that doesn't necessarily lead to their death," Catlin said.

Regression can be done by anyone, but Catlin said it's not a good idea. The experience will be more beneficial when an experienced person supervises it.

Author emphasizes use of oral history

Hispanic awareness

By Amy Hadlock Collegian Reporter

The importance of oral history was the main topic of a lecture by author Patricia Preciado Martin at the Hispanic American Leadership Organization luncheon Tuesday in the K-State Union.

"I think that oral history is an important way for us to learn about ourselves," Martin said. "It is also very important for us to learn about our families and our past. Many of these stories that are about one family relate to many other families.

Martin has authored three books, including one of Mexican-American stories.

"Right now I am working on a book that will be titled "Songs My Mother Sang to Me," she said. "I wanted to write this book to show what Mexican-American women are really about. For this book, I have interviewed many women. However, I am talking to women only 70 years old or older. This way, I get the story from women that remember a time that was different, it was not in the technical Martin said she is also interested in writing a book about Mexican gardens.

"This book would include information on the different plants and their uses throughout the years, only not in a scientific way, but with quotes from some of the different people having Mexican gardens," she said.

Martin also plans to write a book about Mexican-American men titled "Sons of the Sun."

Martin graduated from the University of Arizona with a degree in elementary education. She writes books from her home.

Martin delivered the keynote address for Hispanic Awareness Month, sponsored by HALO.

Expansion plan enters Phase III

Kansas Entrepreneurial Center continues to add new office, research areas

By Bill Sier Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Entrepreneurial Center, established to help new businesses develop a foothold in the community, is one step closer to being finalized.

The KEC, located in the South-western Bell Telephone building on Fairchild Avenue, opened more than a year ago but more phases were planned, said John W. Walters, president of the center.

Recently the KEC completed Phase II of its expansion plan, which consists of individual office and research areas for businesses to set up operations in the center.

The center now has 7,000 square feet of space, with the possibility of serving more than 10 businesses. It serves five tenants.

"Phase I was the construction of our shared-use office space and resource areas," said Michaela Lewis, office manager for the center.

Phase III will entail creating more business space from existing undeveloped areas in the building.

"Above all, they must have a business plan," Lewis said. This means the people involved with the business must have an idea how they want the business to develop. Most of the people using the center have an existing business that needs help in establishing itself, she said.

They want to be part of the center because they need space and credibility," Lewis said.

Due to security limitations, the center cannot handle retail outlets, but will provide office support for a retail business.

"We add reality to starting a new business. This is the way the business world operates," Lewis said.

Space at the center costs $4 per square foot per year, she said. For example, the smallest office available costs $30 a month. "But we provide other services as well as the rental cost," Lewis said. The center will provide a mailing address and telephone support for a new business. A fax machine and a copier are available for tenant use.

Walters said the center, through a program known as the landing party concept, will also assist existing companies looking for a foothold in a university town.

In this concept, an existing corporation would come to K-State to be near an institution for research and would rent office space at the center.

The idea of this concept, Walters said, is that once a corporation has spent some time and experienced life in Manhattan, they may look more favorably on relocating here.

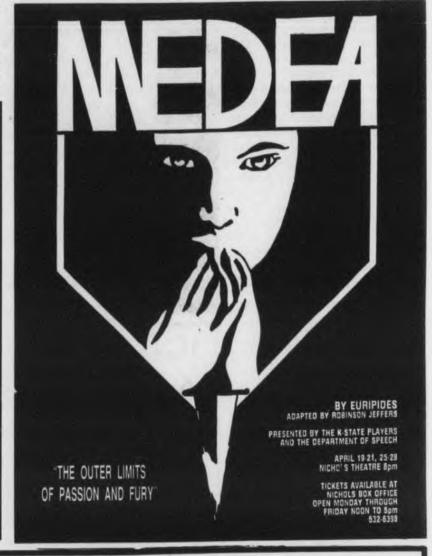

"I personally believe that K-State self-sustaining," he said.

has a number of very key research areas," Walters said. "If we could use those resources properly, we could support the University and the community."

The KEC is jointly funded by a number of area entities. Among these are several businesses, Riley and Pottawatomie counties and the city of Manhattan. The center is also funded by several K-State departments, including the College of Engineering and the KSU Research Foundation, of which Walters is the president.

This Piece of Paper...

Can Get You This Piece of Paper.

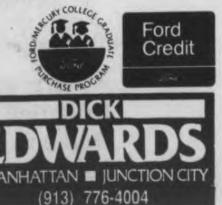

Other college graduate programs make you jump through more hoops than a circus lion. Forget these gymnastics. Dick Edwards has the Ford-Mercury College Graduate Purchase Program. We'll arrange $400 cash back from Ford Motor Company and pre-approved financing from Ford Credit. All you have to do is take delivery from our stock by December 31, 1990 (or place a factory order by October 1, 1990), and graduate with a Bachelor's or advanced degree between April 1, 1989 and December 31, 1990. Was that hard?

Pre-Approved Credit

To qualify for pre-approved credit, you must have verifiable employment beginning within 120 days of vehicle purchase. Your salary must be sufficient to cover living expenses as well as a car payment. A prior credit history isn't necessary, but if you have one, it has to be satisfactory to Ford Credit. Duck soup. Choose the College Graduate Purchase Program that gives you the car you want and the cash you need. Visit Dick Edwards today for all the details.

Film looks at freedom in life

'The Unbearable Lightness of Being' captures mix of sensuality, philosophy

"The Unbearable Lightness of Being," this week's Kaleidoscope film offering, is an intoxicating mix of sensuality and philosophy.

The film, directed by Philip Kaufman, is based on the book of the same name by Czechoslovakian author Milan Kundera. Kundera's text is not designed for a cinematic interpretation due to its tangential philosophical observations. The screenplay Kaufman co-wrote for the film fleshes out Kundera's skeletal plot without compromising the book's grand theories.

The film is billed as "a lovers' story," but it is not pigeonholed that easily. As Kundera did in his book, Kaufman explores the very nature of freedom as it applies to the central triumvirate of characters. The characters' personal and social freedoms are the focal point of the film's study.

"The Unbearable Lightness of Being" succeeds because of its balance of allegory and intimacy. The characters could represent any human, yet, at all times they are individuals with distinct passions and desires. Kaufman fills the film with a warm and responsive philosophy.

It is likely the movie would fail in its quest if it were not for the excellent quality of acting involved. Each of the three pivotal characters are brought to life through superb performances.

Daniel Day-Lewis portrays Tomas, a Czechoslovakian brain surgeon who is consumed by his passion for women. To his credit, Day-Lewis elevates his character above a simplistic one-dimensional portrayal of a lecher. Instead, he fashions a seductive character who is full of life and Tomas believes personal freedom is his only prerogative. He eschews opportunities to flee his native Czechoslovakia, choosing to stay and live his life to the fullest. Tomas revels in his lightness, but finds he may have been deluding himself as to its importance.

Even though this film was early in his career, "The Unbearable Lightness of Being" shows why Day-Lewis won the Best Actor Oscar for his role in the criminally underscreened "My Left Foot." The actor is versatile and adept in any role.

French actress Juliette Binoche plays Tereza, a young innocent woman working in a rural Czech spa. Binoche's Tereza is full of life and painful awkwardness. Overwhelming emotion fills Binoche's face whenever she is onscreen. She is a joy to watch.

Initially, Tereza appears to be the antithesis of Tomas' wild ways. She is almost paralyzed by a lack of structure in her life. In the end, it is Tereza who sways Tomas. When Tereza joins Tomas in Prague, he begins to tone down his excesses. The two characters' interactions illustrate the joys and agonies of love. Day-Lewis and Binoche are stunning together.

The triangle is completed by Sabina, played by Lena Olin. Sabina is an artist who is a confidante and lover of Tomas. She understands Tomas better than he himself does. Olin brings an unbridled passion to her Sabina is unique from the other two principals in that she has mastered the freedom of life. She is tied to no one and nothing. She is truly a free spirit, not merely a pretender like Tomas. She is able to bear the weight of her independent choices.

The film is set in Prague in 1968 on the eve of the Prague Spring, an uprising of the Czech people against their Soviet oppressors. The ideas of the uprising are embodied in the central characters. Again, it is the struggle between freedom and control. Some need the lightness of being, others must have structure. Some will impose order upon others.

Kaufman's film is extremely sensual, and that sensuality embodies more than mere eroticism. The cinematography is lush and warm. Colors are deep and rich. Figures are studied not just observed. The movie is a feast for the eyes as well as the mind.

Despite the philosophical nature of "The Unbearable Lightness of Being" and its imposing setting, the tone is often witty and humorous. The film runs the gamut of emotions without leaving the audience feeling manipulated. Tereza's first night with Tomas is touching, yet it is hysterical at times as well.

"The Unbearable Lightness of Being" works on many levels which is why it works so well. The film is involving and thought-provoking.

"The Unbearable Lightness of Being" will be shown at 7 p.m. today in Union Forum Hall, at 3:30 p.m. Thursday in Union Little Theatre and at 7 p.m Thursday in Forum Hall. Admisssion is $1.75.

Students lobby at Capitol to gain adjustment funds

Student Body President Todd Johnson speaks at a K-State student rally on the steps of the Capitol in Topeka Wednesday. More than 250 students lobbied for full funding of the enrollment adjustment.

By Gregory A. Branson Collegian Reporter A flood of more than 250 students invaded the State Capitol Building in Topeka Wednesday to lobby for full reimbursement of the University's enrollment adjustment.

The lobbying effort was sponsored jointly by Student Governing Association and the K-State branch of the Associated Students of Kansas, to persuade the Legislature to fund the $4.68 million enrollment adjustment. The state is currently proposing to fund $2.58 million.

Todd Johnson, student body president, said he heard later Wednesday night that the conference committee has recommended not topass the increase. But he said there could still be a chance for a change. The bill has to pass the Senate, which favors the increase.

"This was pretty much expected," Johnson said.

Todd Heitschmidt, K-State director of ASK, said the University deserved to have the full adjustment.

'When KU had the big enrollment jump, they got their full fund-ing," Heitschmidt said. "If they want to change the enrollment adjustment formula next year, that's fine. But we just want what's fair."

The Legislature opened its wrapup session Wednesday morning to complete unfinished business left from the regular spring session.

Students left K-State at 8:15 a.m. and drove to Topeka to talk directly to senators and representatives before they started the session at 10.

Peter LaGue, sophomore in architecture, said he went to voice his concerns directly to the legislators and to show there are concerned students.

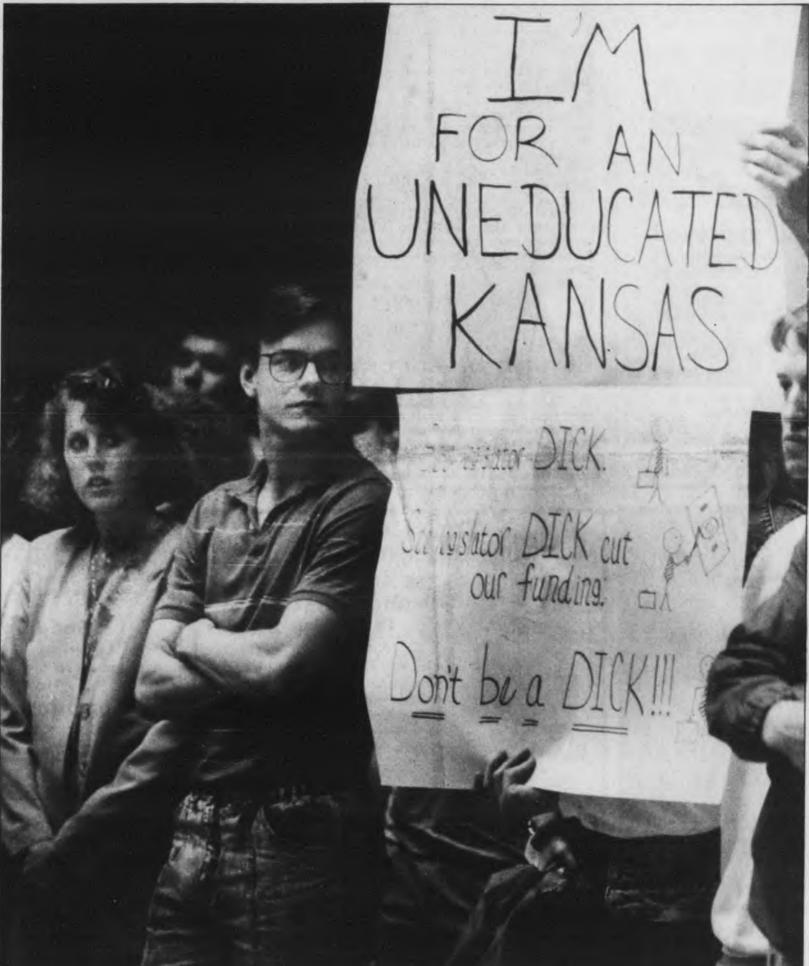

"Our main concern is the possibilty of 100 classes getting canceled," LaGue said. "Now that our enrollment is up where we want it, they're going to cut our money

Many students ran into problems when they tried to talk to the legislators.

'I've been to three different offices and haven't been able to talk to any of them," Tom Neppl, sophomore in park resource management said. "They all have been out of their office.

Sen. Doug Walker, D-Osawatomie, said he doesn't believe K-State will receive the full adjustment.

Telescope released; shuttle in 20th orbit

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. - After years of delay and a last-minute snag, the Hubble Space Telescope was freed from the Discovery on Wednesday and, glinting in the sunlight, drifted off on its 15-year search for new worlds.

Mission specialist Steven Hawley released Hubble from the end of the shuttle's 50-foot-long mechanical arm after a delay in getting one of the telescope's solar wings unfurled.

"The first of NASA's great observatories is now on station at 330 nautical miles above the Earth," Mission Control's Jeffrey Carr said.

The $1.5 billion telescope was released at 3:38 p.m. EDT as the shuttle entered its 20th orbit of Earth, nearly two hours and one orbit later than planned. The shuttle then backed

"Thank you very much for the ride," said Mike Harrington, director of orbital verifications at Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt, Mission specialists Bruce McCandless and Kathryn Sullivan had been in the shuttle's airlock, ready to walk in space to free the solar panel. That proved to be unnecessary.

"We have good news. One day, six hours, 30 minutes' mission elasped time, we have full deployment of the starboard wing," Mission Control's Dave Drachlis reported from Goddard.

The first solar array unreeled from its mast at midday Wednesday as the shuttle passed 380 miles above South America's eastern coast. It started providing power to the telescope's batteries, which otherwise had only eight hours of charge.

Deployment of the starboard panel, however, was more troublesome. It refused to budge when latches were first released, then moved about a fifth of its 39-foot length, and stopped again. A third attempt rolled the panel out all the way.

"Houston, we see motion," Commander Loren Shriver reported. "Discovery, all is looking well, could you zoom out now please," Mission Control replied. Hawley began the long process of releasing Hubble shortly after 7 a.m. EDT when he grasped the Hubble with Discovery's 50-foot-long mechanical arm and carefully hoisted the 121/2 -ton telescope high above the shuttle.

Hubble was taken off shuttle electrical power just before it was lifted out of the cargo bay and was operating on its own nickel-hydrogen

"At one day, seven minutes into the flight of Discovery, Hubble is now on its own internal power," Carr said. "The game has begun. The race is on. The clock is ticking."

Worries that the telescope's instrument would be starved for electricity eased after the first solar panel was stretched out.

Senate to hear beer plan

Football stadium alcohol consumption policy to be reconsidered tonight

By Heather Stewart Collegian Reporter

Student Senate will hear first readings on a bill that would ease rules concerning the consumption of alcohol at the KSU Stadium at 7 p.m. tonight in the K-State Union Big Eight Room.

Chris Kern, senate chairman, said the legislation is in response to student concerns about holding tailgate parties in the stadium parking lot. The resolution will ask the administration to set aside a section of the parking lot for people who want to consume alcohol before games.

Bill Nelson, chairman of the Athletic Ticket Sales Committee, said he received many phone calls concerning his recommendation.

"Tonight will be a good barometer for me to see how the senators feel," Nelson said. "This will be an indication about which way it will go. If there are a lot of negative questions. I may drop it, but I have received positive feedback from some senators, too."

Nelson said although he hopes the recommendation passes, the impression he has received from the administration is that the Board of Regents will not approve alcohol consumption in the stadium parking lot. The approval of three students to the 1990 engineering, are up for approval by Senate. 'EOF needed more representatives on it," Kern said. "One also needed to be a senator, and Todd is a senator."

The second approval of appointments is for the Student Governing Association Elections Committee Chair. Doug McIver, freshman in engineering, was selected by the Personnel Selections Committee for the position and must be approved by Senate.

Another personnel selection up for approval is the chair of the Student Affairs and Social Services Standing Committee. Shannon Malone, business senator, has been selected through interviews by the Senate chair and vice-chair to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Monica Connet, education senator.

"Shannon was selected for her work already done on the committee and for her enthusiasm throughout the year," Kern said.

Rosalind Fisher, director of personnel services, will give a workshop on "Communicating Across Cultures" during Senate open period. Fisher's workshop will last one hour and will deal with communication between multi-cultural groups, Kern said. The workshop is open to everyone.

Measles cases rise; campus total at 25

By Stacie Sanders Collegian Reporter

Twice the number of measles cases have been diagnosed at Lafene Student Health Center this semester as the total number of cases diagnosed during the outbreak last year.

Dr. Larry Moeller, chief of staff at Lafene said there have been 25 clinically diagnosed cases of measles at the University this semester. Many of these cases were diagnosed Tuesday and Wednesday.

"It's a larger problem, and there is the potential to see it up until the end of school," he said. In many cases, the patient had been vaccinated, but had been vaccinated too early or had received a dead virus, Moeller said. He said students, faculty and staff should check their shot records. People who were vaccinated between 1963 and 1967 or were vaccinated before the age of 15 months should be revaccinated. People who have been directly exposed to the measles should also be revaccinated regardless of their last vaccination date.

People who are pregnant, allergic to eggs or neomycin, should not receive the vaccine, Moeller said. In addition, people with depressed immune systems should not receive the vaccine.

Moeller said people should limit exposure to public places. Students should attend class, but avoid needlessly going out and risking exposure to the virus because the outbreak is difficult to contain.

Lafene is seeing the common seven-day measles, or red measles, he said.

Measles shots are available at Lafene 24 hours a day, he said. The vaccination costs $2.

Leftist Sandinista rule ends

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP) — Violeta Barrios de Chamorro took the presidential oath Wednesday, ending 11 years of leftist Sandinista rule in Central America's largest country. She immediately proclaimed a political amnesty and ended the military draft.

"This blessed Nicaragua, instead of burying its sons in a fratricidal war, will bury its weapons forever, so the cannon will never roar again," Chamorro told a crowd of 15,000 inside a Managua baseball stadium.

The transition follows nine years of a U.S.-backed insurgency in which 30,000 people died. Chamorro inherits a legacy of suspicion and distrust, a nation of 3.5 million residents that resembles an armed camp and an economy shattered by the U.S. trade embargo and rampant inflation.

The inauguration of Chamorro, a conservative elected in February, brought immediate U.S. aid and trade assistance.

Outgoing President Daniel Ortega lashed at the United States — which backed the Contra rebels — for supporting an "unjust and cruel war." He promised to lead a constructive opposition and said if civil war broke out again, "the elections would have been for nothing."

German leader stabbed

BONN, West Germany (AP) — A woman in a white dress stabbed opposition leader Oskar Lafontaine in the neck Wednesday while offering him flowers at a campaign rally. Officials said he was in serious condition.

Lafontaine, the left-of-center governor of Saarland state and Chancellor Helmut Kohl's leading challenger in the upcoming December elections, was stabbed with a knife as he was about to sign an autograph for his attacker, police said.

Hospital authorities said the 46-year-old leader of the Social Democratic Party was in serious condition due to blood loss but that his life was no longer in danger. A neck artery was severed in the attack, ministry officials said.

Social Democrat spokesman Eduard Heussen said the attacker approached Lafontaine on the dais at a rally in a Cologne suburb with a bouquet of flowers and an album containing poetry.

The woman stabbed Lafontaine while he was looking at the album, Heussen said.

Lafontaine was rushed by helicopter to the University Clinic in the Cologne suburb of Lindenthal, police said.

Tornado-damage aid approved

WASHINGTON (AP) — A Senate committee has approved $2.5 million in emergency aid for Kansas communities damaged by tornadoes last month.

The money is part of a supplemental money bill approved Tuesday by the Senate Appropriations Committee and sent to the floor for consideration.

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., said Wednesday that the money for Kansas communities would come out of unspent disaster assistance provided last year for earthquake and hurricane damage.

The money bill also contains emergency economic aid requested by President Bush for Panama and Nicaragua.

Once the Senate acts, the measure will go to a joint House-Senate negotiating committee to resolve differences in spending by the two chambers. Dole said he hoped the bill can be sent to the president in a week.

Region Lit joint brings conviction

LAWRENCE (AP) — A Lawrence man who said he will support legalization of marijuana in his congressional campaign was convicted of marijuana possession today.

Mark Creamer, 43, was convicted by Douglas County District Judge James W. Paddock of the misdemeanor charge. He could receive up to one year in the county jail and a $2,000 fine when he is sentenced May 23.

Creamer and his lawyer, Jerry Harper of Lawrence, said they will appeal the conviction.

District Attorney Jim Flory called three policemen to testify against Creamer, who was arrested when he went to Lawrence police headquarters in September, lighted what he said was a marijuana cigarette and blew smoke at a dispatcher. The demonstration occurred the same night President Bush announced on national television that he was earmarking $7.9 billion for the war on drugs.

A videotape aired in court today showed Creamer smoking what appeared to be marijuana and trying to flag down a passing police officer. The video showed him later smoking what appeared to be a marijuana cigarette in police headquarters.

Creamer announced earlier this month that he was starting to circulate petitions to get his name on the Democratic ballot for 2nd District congressman.

Condom availability discussed

"We can be a role model and a leader to the rest of our society by having condoms accessible (to the students)," said Dr. Larry Moeller, chief of staff at Lafene Wednesday during a panel discussion on whether to install condom vending machines on campus.

The panel consisted of seven participants in support of installing condom machines on campus. The panelists were Cindy Burke, health educator at Lafene; Besty Bergen, associate professor for human development and family studies; Dave Haden, director of Haymaker Hall; Moeller; Monica Connet, peer AIDS educator; and Kim Fankhauser, junior in elementary education and student senator.

The debate's primary focus was on the accessibility of condoms to students. In addition, the issue of educating students about AIDS, sexually transmitted diseases and birth control was also discussed.

"We need not only to promote the educational effort, but we also need to make condoms available where the students are," Haden said.

Condoms are already available in Lafene from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday and in various drugstores and convenience stores near campus, Moeller said. Having condom machines installed on campus would enable students access 24 hours a day.

Installing the vending machines on campus would alleviate the embarrassment of buying condoms at a public place, Moeller said.

The installation of condom vending machines will not take place unless there is a strong base of student support.

KPL workers help repair power lines in tunnels

By Margaret Clarkin Collegian Reporter

A gas leak located between Durland Hall and the Physical Plant was discovered Wednesday afternoon.

The leak was on a main gas line coming into campus, said Randy Slover, shop manager at division of management facilities. It was repaired by 6 p.m.

Slover said the main gas line runs north and south next to the sidewalk by Durland.

"We noticed a leak in the tunnels that feed the buildings (with gas)," Slover said. "We started digging yesterday (Tuesday)."

Slover said Facilities called KPL Gas Service and they came out with a gas sniffer, which indicated where there was a leak.

"Since it was a high-power gas line, KPL helped us patch it," he said. "They are more experienced with high-power lines.' He said KPL called the fire department to alert them about the leak around noon. By Wednesday evening, they had reached the leak and it was repaired. "It's patched," Slover said.

"We'll fill up the holes (that were dug to find the leak).'

Holocaust horror affects veteran

Manhattan resident remembers images of prisoners in labor camps, corpses

> By Elvyn Jones Collegian Reporter

Although this week is set aside as Holocaust Remembrance Week, retired civil servant Ed Hirsch does not need a reminder to recall the horror of the Holocaust.

On April 11, 1945, Hirsch's tank column arrived at the gates of the Nordhausen Factory Works, a German concentration camp. Hirsch, a resident of Manhattan, was a corporal in the Third Armored Division of the First Army during World War

Hirsch's division had earlier landed on Omaha Beach and had taken part in the deadly hedge-clearing fighting and final bust out at Normandy. He had also particapated in the Battle of the Bulge and, with his division, had fought his way across the Rhine River into Germany and to the Rhur Valley.

The Nordhausen facility held two secrets, Hirsch said. The first secret was a hidden underground factory that produced the V1 and V2 rockets the Germans were using to bomb London. The second secret was the existence of a Jewish slave-labor Hirsch said nothing he had experienced in the War prepared him for what he saw there.

"It was a different thing from what you were prepared to see," he said. "You see a lot of your own people getting killed, which in a way you come to expect. But this I just couldn't believe. I didn't believe a thing like this could happen.

"At that time I didn't realize what it was," he said.

What they found in the camp were a few starving survivors, far outnumbered by corpses stacked in piles, he said. The Germans had pulled out 10 to 14 days before the liberation, leaving those in the camp with no food and water, he said.

United Germany could be world power

"They had better realize we see events in terms of a historical vision." Adolf Schicklgruber ore than 140 years ago, Johann Heidler, a wandering Austrian miller who happened to be working in the village of Duerenthal, Austria, met and married Maria Anna Schicklgruber, a peasant woman from the nearby village of Strones. This marriage was nothing out of the ordinary except for the fact that in June 1837, five years before the marriage, Maria had given birth to an illegitimate son whom she named Alois.

In all probability the father was Johann. However, irrefutable evidence does not exist. What is known, in any case, is Alois grew up as Alois Schicklgruber, if for no reason other than Johann simply never bothered to legitimately adopt the boy after the marriage. Five years after her marriage to Johann, Maria died. Johann vanished, leaving the woeful 10 year-old Alois in the custody of one of Johann's brothers. Alois grew to manhood in the care of his uncle's family.

Nearly 30 years later in the town of Weitra, Johann Hitler would appear to testify before a notary, in the presence of witnesses, that he was the father of one Alois Schicklgruber (apparently Alois was to obtain a share of an inheritance from another of Johann's brothers, and certain legal documents were thus necessary).

The notary forwarded the statement to the parish priest at Doellersheim, who then scratched out the name of Schicklgruber in the "holy" baptismal registry (not unlike the numerous corrections made to the "Holy Book" itself through the ages) and wrote in its stead the name of Hitler.

And so Alois Schicklgruber, one day before his fortieth birthday, became Alois

After two marriages, Alois Schicklgruber-Hitler eventually married his second cousin, Klara Poelzl, 23 years his junior. Four months later in January, 1885, Klara gave birth to Gustav (it would seem Alois was determined to father a "filius nullius" of his own). This first child, as well as the second, Ida, died in infancy. Adolf, born April 20, 1889, at Braunau am Inn, Austria-Hungary, was the third born, and the first to survive, of the five children born to this quasiincestuous, Catholic couple.

Adolf Hitler (some could logically argue Schicklgruber), had he survived the war and old age, would have been 101 years old Friday last.

William Shirer writes in "The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich," "Had the eighty-four-year-old wandering miller not made his unexpected reappearance to recognize the paternity of his thirty-nine-year-old son nearly thirty years after the death of the mother, Adolf Hitler would have been born Adolf Schicklgruber. ... I have heard Germans speculate whether Hitler could have become the master of Germany had he been known to the world as Schicklgruber."

Just as interesting a speculation is whether or not Hitler would find the Germany of today much different than the powerful Germany he established in the 1940s.

No one would argue the Germany of today is the same as the militaristic Nazi State of 1940. Why, Germany today hardly resembles the Germany of six months ago - and will probably bear little likeness to the Germany of six months hence - at least in the political sense. What has nonetheless remained a constant throughout much of this century is the skill of the German businessman to turn a profit, and the political ineptitude with which he does it.

Or maybe "ineptitude" is not the proper

Just as the industrial magnates of industry and finance in the 1930s provided large sums of money and wielded considerable influence in Hitler's rise to power, it is now the German businessman who plays a significant role in nuclear proliferation, as well as the manufacture of equipment and technology necessary for the production of chemical and biological weapons of war.

All in the name of money.

ning at its finest.

Michael Brzoska reports in the July/ August 1989 issue of the "Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists," "The Libyan affair is only one of many cases in which West German companies have exported materials and technology that have been used - or could be used - to produce nuclear, chemical, biological, or other weapons." Brzoska cites several incidences:

"In 1984 the Frankfurt metallurgical company Degussa sold 95 kilograms of beryllium to Bhabha Atomic Research Center in Trombay, India. Beryllium is useful as a reflector material for nuclear bomb cores."

"The Dusseldorf company of Alfred Hempel sold to India, Pakistan, Argentina, and South Africa (all near-nuclear-weapons countries) several hundred tons of heavy water it had earlier bought in China, Norway, and the Soviet Union.

"In 1987 Sigma Chemie, Munich, shipped small amounts of biological warfare agents to Iraq, among other countries. The government licensed the sale of 200 milligrams of highly poisonous mycotoxins. In 1985 the German secret service had reported that it suspected the Iraqi military of building a biological warfare agent plant in Salman Pak, near Baghdad."

'West German companies were instrumental in building the chemical warfare agent plant at Samarra in Iraq, which has been the main source for the poison gas used by the Iraqi armed forces. West German com- tainly the German. panies are currently constructing a large re-

No, this is not ineptitude. This is fiscal cun-search facility, called Project Saad-16, in Mosul, Iraq - a facility designed to handle special metals and toxic chemicals." And the list goes on.

> he promotion of exports has become a national ideology for West Germans, not unlike Hitler's vision of Aryan supremacy. Germans tend to see their economic successes as compensation for Germany's limited world political role. Brzoska cited an adviser to the Kohl government, Hans-Peter Schwarz, as saying, "Political regimes have come and gone, and despite fundamental differences in political systems, despite all revolutions in international systems, despite changes in the size of its territory, the German export machine has triumphed on the world market. ..."

> World powers of the 21st century will not be determined on the basis of military power, but rather in terms of economic power. When you consider the economic health of the United States and the Soviet Union as compared to that of Japan and Germany, that places Japan and Germany in the position of soon-tobe superpowers of the next century.

> Given the typical German businessman's initiative, 10 years may be just enough time to make a united Germany the most powerful nation in the world - a Hitlerian vision if there ever was one. Would Hitler recognize the Germany of today? Maybe not the Germany, but most cer-

Intolerance is pollution

hat are you?" If somone asked you that question in a certain context, you would probably reply "I'm an American, a Kansan, a K-Stater, Wichitan, Manhattanite," or whatever applied. How many people would answer "I'm an earthling"? Not very many. But earthlings, or citizens of the earth, are what we all are. In fact, we're more than that, We're citizens of the world.

By now you're probably moaning, "Oh no, not another Earth Day column." No, this is not another one. The environment is only one of the problems we face, and it's the one receiving the most attention now. But there's more to being a world citizen than recycling beer cans. I'm not belittling the environmentalist movement; I am just suggesting that we need to go one step further.

Good movements start at home. We're off to a good start, and with all the media attention and protests, I'm sure we'll soon have all the recycling bins a University could ever need. We'll be doing our part to make the Earth look a little better and last a little longer. But what are we doing for our fellow citizens? Every day somebody creates a little pollution that wears a fellow citizen down and makes him look bad.

What do I mean by that? I mean statements like these: "We're still paying the Japs because we blew them up forty years ago and now they're taking us to the cleaners with import products." "My landlord, Ling Ping Pong ..." "Damn Commie bastards." "Let's help the hungry in our own country before we send anything to those naked Indian pagans." "For all of you ladies, our store is right next to Kitchens Plus." "This guy in my chem class is brain-dead, but what do you expect? He's an athlete."

This is noise pollution of the very smallest and most insidious sort. It slides into our brains and out of our mouths before we even think about it. None of those statements is paticularly offensive, none even reveals an outright prejudice. They don't amount to much on their own. Neither does one beer can by the side of the road, but it all adds up.

We live right in the middle of the Bible Belt, in one of the most homogeneous areas of the country. A lot of us had never seen a man in a turban or a woman in a sari in person, or gone to school with African or Oriental people. For the most part, we have been surrounded by people who have looked and acted just like ourselves. But that changed when we got to K-State. We grew up listening to our parents or our grandparents talking about "niggers" and "commies" and "japs' and "A-rabs" and "eye-ties" and what they did, how they acted and where they belonged. Now it's time to put aside what we learned and start forming conclusions for ourselves.

We need to shut our mouths and open our minds. To be educated citizens of our world, when someone mentions another country or culture, we need to listen before we judge. Being an American citizen is not a God-given gift to reward the righteous, it is an accident of birth. But what good is an improved acceptance of people with different races and creeds in other countries if our tolerance does not extend to people who hold different beliefs than we do on our own campus? If a bigoted comment about another culture is the verbal equivalent of one beer can by the side of the road, then a slur directed against a campus-oriented group is a beer can in the middle of all that carefully tended grass on our campus, and it is rapidly creating a pretty big pile of smelly garbage. Lately, in the Collegian, we've had people angry with gay rights activists, people angry with Black Student Union, people angry with the Student Senate, with the Collegian, with a certain fraternity ... the list could go on and on.

The Collegian, as a free press, is the place to express responsible opposing viewpoints, not to call names or to point accusing fingers.

We all need to take a few deep breaths and calm down before we express ourselves. The spoken or the written word may be retracted or apologized for, but it will not be forgotten. A comment phrased in anger and later regretted could affect someone's views about a group permanently.

t K-State we are a sort of a model of a functioning society. Something that in the real world appears as a prejudice or a bias against a large and undefined group, here appears as highly personal, against a specific, limited group of individuals. In our model it is easier to follow the different actions and see how the harm gets done, what caused the beer can to be thrown and what damage it did. At K-State one beer can gets attention. In the real world it takes a mountain of them. By the time you have a mountain, you have a problem.

People have been murdered throughout history, and are still being murdered today, simply on the basis of being a member of one group or another. The Christian school children who die when a school bus gets bombed die because they are Christians.

In South Africa, rules are based on the color of your skin, which is a ridiculous way to judge people's merits if ever I heard one. Every time another insult to a group passes by unchallenged, it's a step on the road toward discrimination, hatred, bias, prejudice, and finally wholesale slaughter. If you can devalue a group enough with words, their lives become likewise worthless. As world citizens, we need to watch our words and our actions. If enough people open hearts and minds to tolerate others, then a crude remark will devalue only the speaker. Let he who is without sin cast the first stone. If your religion doesn't do anything that other people might regard as offensive, if your name isn't funny in any language, if your skin isn't black or white or yellow - go ahead and laugh. Make all the jokes you want. But be careful - after all the blacks and the whites and Jews and Christians and gays and greeks and politicians are all gone, society will still need a victim. Intolerant boors could be next on the list.

LETTERS

Coverage poor

Editor,

Senator Todd Giefer's outrage at the Collegian's coverage of Student Senate as reported in Monday's edition is not far off target, in my opinion. He may be overboard in calling for budget cuts that will "kill the messenger," but I could not agree more that the Collegian's present policies in regard to (a) what events are covered and (b) which letters are printed are often self-serving and high-handed. For example, one editorial staffer told a faculty member, if you hassle me (about what events to cover and how to cover them), I won't cover anything.

In regard to (a), I think it is unpardonable that a newspaper funded by student fees pays only "lip-service" attention to many events sponsored by student organizations. Instead, the Collegian appears to delight in producing full-page "human interest" features whose only function seems to be to let the student authors and photographers try their hand at doing "real" newspaper material. That's fine, since the Collegian serves partly as a training ground for future journalists, but I bet I'm not alone in feeling that the student newspaper should thoroughly cover its own backyard (campus events) first, and then if there is room, run its features.

In regard to (b), I would like to see the Collegian adopt a policy that it will print every letter that is critical of its coverage, and that an editor be required to print a response. Failing that, Collegian editors should at least be gracious enough to mail a note to the letterwriter, explaining why her/his letter was not run. I suspect that a letter I wrote that met editorial page editor Eric Henry's stated guidelines ("length, timeliness, readability and whether or not the material will encourage intelligent, open discussion") has not been printed because it took the Collegian to task for lack of depth and insight in its story about long lines at the enrollment center. But almost a week later, I have not received a reply.

Finally, about being an award-winner. Student-operated KSDB just recently won more awards at a Kansas Association of Broadcasters competition than any other college station in Kansas. But if you look closely at the categories used in most media awards contests, you will find that they reflect the "nuts and bolts" of the business that can be judged easily by insiders. There are no categories for "most-respected by readers/ listeners" or "responsiveness to constituents." To find that out, the students who run the campus media have got to act as if they believe that there is no higher calling than doing a hell of a lot more than listening to their constituents: to find out what needs are going unmet, and then to devise systems for supplying them. The senators who complain about the Collegian's coverage, and the callers who complain about lack of real album rock on KSDB, are holding up their end of the dialogue. Where is the response from the students who run the campus media?

> Dave MacFarland associate professor of radio and television

Comments wrong

Editor,

I was dismayed, but not shocked by Todd Giefer's comments concerning the Kansas State Collegian's recent coverage of events surrounding the "these people" controversy. The Collegian's role is to report as accurately as possible newsworthy items that affect the student body at K-State.

Since the beginning of this school year, the members of Student Senate have shown themselves to be disorganized, politicing imbeciles catering to special interest groups and have shown insensitivity to minority groups that comprise the student body.

The incident involved is controversial, not the reporting. It is an indefensive remark that no explanation justifies.

The more Todd Giefer opens his mouth, the more idiotic he sounds. What would he like to do, preview every Collegian before it goes to print to put his okey-dokey on it? Maybe Giefer would like to restrict freedom of the press. The Collegian is not a vehicle for the Student Senate, but for the students. It is our right to know how the Senate is performing. If Giefer's comments are any indication, it would seem that the students are being poorly represented.

The Collegian was not created for Giefer's benefit or to support what the Student Senate is doing. Giefer believes controversy is "not what we need." I would argue that controversy causes change - change in perception, change in thought and change in awareness. This is needed in the Student Senate and the student body. The Collegian, used properly, can help bring about changes.

I salute the Collegian for tackling tough, 'controversial" issues - real issues that affect the campus. Giefer suggests monetary coercion in order to shape the Collegian's reporting and censor the news to meet his agenda. What "kind of actions" will Giefer perform? If we're all lucky, he will resign. As the proverb goes, "If you can't take the heat, get out of the kitchen." It is time to get out, Giefer.

> Matthew Mazuroski junior in speech/theater and two others

Thanks for support

Thank you, K-State students. Those of you who traveled to Topeka and those who rallied in the Union represented K-State well.

Its been a long time since students have sent such a strong message to Topeka. You've not only educated Kansans about the enrollment adjustments; you've also gained their respect and confidence.

And to think the legislators would even try to short-change the student body of K-State.

> Todd Johnson Student Body President

Works need home

After reading about the great start of the Essential Edge National Campaign in the Collegian and noting the 11 individual goals ranging from $200,000 to more than $8 million, I began to wonder if the modest goal of $229,652 set for the University Art Museum will be sufficient for a facility that will exhibit the internationally renowned works of art present on our campus.

Specifically, I am thinking about the many great works of perhaps our most famous artist who is Mitsugi Ohno. Ohno is the glass-blower for the campus and also makes glass sculptures, many of which are on display in museums and galleries around the world. Several of his sculptures can be seen in the K-State Union. Every time I view them there,

I realize what an international treasure we have in Ohno and somehow feel that a Union corridor is just not the proper setting for his works. I believe it would be appropriate to set aside a special room in the University Art Museum just for the works of Ohno. I hope the modest funding earmarked for the museum will allow that to happen.

> Karl J. Kramer adjunct professor of biochemistry

Service great

For all the moaning and groaning that goes on in this space, I think it's time to do the opposite and say something nice about a group of people who work very hard to allow us to have fun. These people include all those who work at Recreational Services at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex. I don't think anyone can dispute the high quality intramural sports, recreational sports and fitness programs offered by Rec Services. Having been at K-State for four years and being manager of the independent intramural team, 'Blinded by Science," I have participated in nearly all the programs offered by Rec. Services. It is without a doubt the best recreational and fitness facility I have ever frequented. Most other facilities offer a lot fewer programs for much more money.

In addition to this wonderful program is, of course, the people involved in administering, organizing and supervising what goes on.

Without excellent people, the program wouldn't exist. I feel that from the top down, the people at Rcc Services do their job extremely well and with the utmost courtesy. I also feel that the floor and field supervisors and officials perform their duties adeptly and with a lot of professionalism.

I would like to thank everyone involved with Rec Services for a fantastic year and urge everyone else to do the same.

Funding welcome

Editor,

I would like to thank Student Senate for continuing to fund Amnesty International Group #251 here on campus. The allocation of the requested $264.30 to our group will be a big help to us next school year. I can assure all of Senate that the money will be spent wisely. I'd also like to assure engineering senator

Todd Giefer, who said "There is no way I could ever justify giving student money to this organization," that students on this campus are concerned about human rights violations around the world, as well as at home.

Sure, students could send in money to the national office and become involved that way, but having a local group is a much better way to receive information and become more personally involved. And, there are a lot of students involved in our group, more than enough to prove false your statement that this group does not benefit the students of Kansas State University." This group not only benefits them, but also prisoners of conscience all over the world.

For those unfamiliar with us, Amnesty International is a non-political, non-religious international organization dedicated to three tasks: 1) freeing prisoners of conscience, or those imprisoned or tortured for communicating their beliefs in a non-violent manner; 2) assuring the just and speedy trials for all prisoners; 3) abolishing the death penalty, which we see as the ultimate form of torture. We accomplish these goals by writing letters to the appropriate officials. And, it works.

The Conspiracy of Hope rock concerts have been useful in the past to educate people about our group. The K-State Amnesty group is holding a benefit rock concert for just this purpose on April 29 starting at 2 p.m. at Baystreet in Aggieville. All ages are welcome. Bands scheduled are: No Pun Intended, the Mahoots, Big Red Fish, Mongol Beach Party, Loud Sounding Dream, Jeff Graham, Las Voces de Halo and The Aging Hippies From Hell. I urge everyone to come out and listen to some great music and learn more about supporting human rights. I also urge everyone to come to our meetings and get involved next year. Look for us at the Activities Fair next semester. You can make a difference.

'Cats set to face NCAA champion Shockers tonight

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

Wake the kids, phone the neighbors, Late Night with the Wildcats and the Shockers is about to hit Manhattan.

No, we're not in Manhattan, N.Y., and David Letterman is nowhere to be found.

But K-State's David of the Diamond - righthander Hierholzer will take the mound tonight at 7 when his Wildcats face the defending national champions from Wichita State.

The Shockers, ranked eighth in the most recent Baseball America poll and 13th in the Collegiate Baseball listing, took the NCAA baseball title last spring in Omaha,

And if K-State is to hand Wichita State a defeat tonight, all-America candidate Hierholzer will likely be a big reason why.

"Every time David goes to the mound, our team has a lot of confidence," said Wildcat coach Mike Clark. "He's just a kid we like to see out there." When Hierholzer has gone to the mound, K-State has been tough. He's 6-2 with a 1.36 earned run average. His lone decision against a ranked foe was a 2-1 loss to Arkansas in the season opener.

The Wildcats are coming off an 18-14 win over Creighton, like Wichita State, a member of the Missouri Valley Conference. In that game the Wildcat offense continued to produce, but the team's woes on the mound continued.

The 20-30 mph wind didn't help,

"The No. 1 thing we're stressing right now is getting back to playing basic fundamental baseball," Clark said. "That's pitching well, playing good defense, swinging the bats.

'Maybe we got too hung up in the number of wins and lost sight of how we got there."

With free hot dogs, soft drinks, squeeze bottles handed out before the contest and a good crowd expected, Clark hopes the team can come through.

"It would be good when we have a crowd to play our best baseball," Clark said. "We'd like to give people a reason to come back."

The largest home crowd in K-State history witnessed the 1986 meeting between the schools.

David Mayes/Staff

Dan Skala (20) and Chris Hmielewski hope they have more things to celebrate tonight against Wichita State like this Hmielewski home run in the 'Cats win against Creighton Tuesday.

CHALK TALK

Roll out the red carpet - the Shockers are coming to town.

There is no sarcasm in that statement. In fact, you're in for a real baseball treat if you can make it to Frank Myers Field for today's 7 p.m. contest between Wichita State and K-State. And, if you're a connoisseur of free hot dogs, pop and squeeze bottle give-a-ways, the festivities begin at 6 p.m.

It's an opportunity to experience, in person, what you've probably seen on television (thanks to the magic of cable) at one time or another. The Shockers, ranked eighth in this week's Baseball America Top 25 poll and 13th by Collegiate Baseball/ESPN, fashion an abundance of talent and tradition. Both are highlighted by the 1989 College World Series championship.

Under Coach Gene Stephenson, Wichita State climbed from a revitalized program to a perennial national power in the time it takes most teams to establish a respectable foundation. Stephenson took over in 1977 and had the Shockers in the CWS at Omaha, Neb., five seasons later. WSU made it to the title game that year, losing 9-3 to Miami, Fla.

been back to Rosenblatt Stadium twice, finishing third in 1988 and winning it all last season. Success has brought high expectations in Wichita, and Shocker fans don't spend a lot of time talking about the Missouri Valley Conference race or post-season league tournament. They'd rather spend that time figuring out which Omaha motel has all the modern conveniences.

The Shocks' success has created a subway following throughout the state. As last summer's drama unfolded, Wildcat fans, Jayhawks, Ichabods, Homets — you get the rallied behind Wichita State.

The Shockers' national championship march was welldocumented. Injuries to key players, coupled with a rugged regular season schedule, forced WSU to claim a four-game sweep of Creighton to win the MVC title. Wichita State did just that, but the road to Omaha contained more potholes.

By winning the regular season tle, the Shocks earned the right to host the conference's post-season tournament. Indiana State ignored WSU's home field advantage, taking a pair from the host to win the

Despite the disappointing losses, Wichita State was given a top-seed at the West II regional in Fresno, Calif. Michigan played the villain role in the first round, pounding the Shocks 14-5. WSU regrouped and won a berth in the CWS by traveling the loser's bracket route to the title. In the regional championship, Wichita State took a pair from the Wolverines, 3-2 and 9-5.

In Omaha, the Shockers were tossed into the loser's bracket after dropping a 4-2 decision to Florida State. Motivated by the losses of injured shortstop Mike Lansing and outfielder Jeff Bonacquista, WSU fought back with four impressive wins to earn a spot against Texas in the title game.

In the fifth inning against Texas, first baseman Bryant Winslow suffered a broken leg during a collision with a Longhorn baserunner. Unable to continue, the Shockers had one more inspirational boost to win the title.

Wichita State did, 5-3.

Through the adversity, Stephenson's crew generated quite a following. The fan club has become large enough that K-State's fastest conference start in history this season went virtually unnoticed around the state. Success by the 'Cats and Jayhawks usually takes a backseat in the sports page to what the Shocks are doing.

But K-State coach Mike Clark has never let WSU's extensive notoriety bother him. He has said he welcomes it because of the attention it draws to the Midwest, a region with a climate hardly suited for baseball. Clark has also said that the Shocker program is one of his measuring tools for the success of his own program.

Having already won two more games in the conference than all of last season, the 'Cats are putting themselves in a position to attract a share of the statewide attention, KU has also opened some eyes, beating the Shockers in Wichita earlier this

So, get out to the ballpark and see if the 'Cats can do the same.

King signs letter

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

There's a new King in Big Eight Conference basketball, and he'll be wearing K-State purple and white rather than Oklahoma crimson and Darryl King, a 6-foot-9 center and brother of former Sooner star center Stacey King, signed a national letterof-intent Wednesday to join Coach Dana Altman's Wildcats.

"Darryl potentially can score for us inside," Altman said of the transfer from Midland (Texas) Community College. "We're hoping that he makes an impact.

"We don't want or expect him to be Stacey. We just want him to do as well as he can because he's a talented

King spent the past two years at Midland, a school that has produced several Big Eight players over the past few years. Midland's alums include two players who recently used up their collegiate eligibility — OU's Skeeter Henry and K-State's Billy Ray Smith.

As a freshman at Midland, King averaged 10.5 points and 6.1 rebounds a game. He also set a school freshman record for blocked shots in a scason with 100.

He left the team during his sophomore season after 13 games because of differences with the coaching

"We were a little disappointed with what happened during his sophomore year," Altman said. "It didn't go as we would have liked, but we feel good about the situation

King has been listed as one of the country's best juco centers by several publications. Blue Ribbon Yearbook listed him among its top 10, and another recruiting service ranked him as the nation's fourth-best pivot

In high school at Lawton, Okla., he was a three-year letterman and averaged 20 points and 14 rebounds a game during his senior season.

King selected K-State over Arizona State and Memphis State following his official campus visit last weekend.

Another juco player on campus at the same time as King - Cloud County's Keary Williams - has reportedly signed a letter-of-intent, with the official announcement ex-

Netters open play at Big 8 meet

By Dan Wicker Sports Reporter

The battle for second place in the Big Eight Conference women's tennis race shapes up as one of the best in several years, according to K-State coach Steve Bietau.

That should give the Wildcat netters an extra degree of hope entering the conference tourney, which begins today in Oklahoma City and runs through Friday.

The regular season final standings had Nebraska in second, Oklahoma in third, and Kansas and K-State tied for fourth.

All four of the teams were separated by only five conference points. Competitive? You bet.

K-State, 4-3 in Big Eight play, is coming off a 7-2 trouncing of Colorado in Boulder. The defeat was the worst suffered by the Buffaloes this season.

"The girls are playing with a lot of confidence and a lot of poise," Bietau said. "They are not doing anything flashy, but they are refusing to take themselves out of a match. Doing that just keeps providing opportunities to find ways to win.

The tournament, which defending champion Oklahoma State is favored to win, kicks off with first-round singles and doubles and semifinals in singles. The second day begins with doubles semifinals followed by the finals in singles and doubles.

The seedings and first-round action have not yet been set in stone. Bietau said he believes one of the four teams fighting for second will be hurt by the draw.

"The only thing I don't like is that part of the outcome will be deter-mined by the draw," Bietau said. "I just hope we get a chance to play for Coming off two strong performances at Oklahoma and Colorado has really lifted the attitudes of the players who, according to Bietau, could have the best postseason tournament ever by a K-State team.

"I've never felt better and we've never had this many points going into the tournament," Bietau said. "I think we are playing our best tennis of the year right now."

K-State does possess the punch of four returning seniors. Marijke Nel, Helen Schildknecht, Sara Hancock and Valerie Rive are the four returnees from last year who Bietau knows will respond to the competition.

"I know that we have got four seniors here, and I really think they will play well," Bietau said. "They have all been there before. They know what it is all about, and they want it very badly.

As positions go for the 'Cats, the season has been strong in doubles play. The doubles record is a bit stronger than singles, but Bictau believes the team will get strong play at every position.

"I think that we will be seeded in two out of the three doubles positions. I feel good about our doubles because we have been consistently strong there," Bietau said. "We are also playing well in all of the singles spots. It has to be a team effort."

For the long-awaited success that the tennis team so badly desires in postseason play and has worked throughout the season to achieve, there are three things Bietau said must to be done.

"A good draw won't hurt you. The second thing is to play well in as many positions as possible, and the third thing is to maintain that for as much of the two day period as possible," Bietau said.

form better and run faster," Capriotti said. "It will help prepare them for the Big Eight meet." The only four track members that will be making the trip to the Penn Relays will be Janet Haskin and Angie Barry in the 10,000 meters. Haskin and Barry placed first and second at KU last weekend in the 5,000 meters.

in Philadelphia.

Paulette Staats will compete in the 3,000 meters and Janet Treiber in the 5,000 meters. Staats captured fifth in the invitational 1,500 last weekend and Treiber was third in the 3,000.

"I think they were the only ones ready for that competition. I'm taking them to Penn because I hope to qualify them for nationals," Capriotti said. "It's on a Thursday evening when its cool and it's in a stadium where there is not a lot of wind."

At the Drake Relays, which is one of the biggest collegiate meets of the season, K-State will take most of the remaining athletes that competed in the Kansas Relays. The meet will be run in front of a sold-out crowd of nearly 20,000, he said.

On the men's side, Capriotti is looking for continuing improvement as the squad prepares for the Big Eight Outdoor.

Among the athletes competing in Des Moines will be Clifton Etheridge, who won the long jump last weekend with a leap of 25 feet. Capriotti said he is ready to bust loose. Marcus Wright will compete in the 800 meters if his entry is accepted.

Also looking to qualify for nationals will be the men's 4x800 meter relay team, which captured the title last weekend at Kansas.

On the women's side, Capriotti said he will be looking for Angie Miller to continue her dominance in the shot put and discus during her junior season. Miller has already qualified for nationals in the shot and is hoping for that mark in the discus this weekend.

'I think she is ready and will get this weekend, but I'm not worried about that mark," Capriotti

Elsewhere for the girls, Ca-priotti is looking for Connic Teaberry to qualify in the high jump, Carla Shannon to qualify and win the triple jump, Markeya Jones to qualify in the 200-meter dash, and for the 4x100-meter relay team to put on a good Capriotti said the Drake Relays. will be one of the last few chances to qualify for nationals.

Monroe shines in 'The Seven Year Itch'

Skirt blowing scene actress' most popular image; role marks acceptance on Hollywood screen

By Richard Jones Collegian Reviewer

"If I'd had a child, I wouldn't want a child of mine to go through what I've been through. I'd like to state here and now, fame is fickle. It stirs up envy. Fame. Who does she think she is? Marilyn Monroe?" — Mari-

In 1954, Marilyn Monroe began production on what is probably one of her most popular movies today. Directed by Billy Wilder, "The Seven Year Itch" teamed Marilyn with Tom Ewell in a comedy about a married man fighting off the temptation of adultery.

Ewell's character, Richard Sherman, lives in a building with his wife and son. Besides his apartment, there are two more; one occupied by two interior decorators and the other by a family. Marilyn's character is staying in the latter, as the family who usually occupies it is on vacation.

The beginning of the film sees Richard sending Helen, his wife of seven years, and son Ricky off to Maine for a vacation. Richard stays behind, burdened by his job at a publishing firm.

While reviewing a manuscript, he encounters a model-turned-actress, played by Marilyn. Learning that she lives above him only intensifies his already overactive imagination.

Throughout the film, Richard fanatasizes about his secretary, nurse and wife's best friend. His imagination also counteracts all of these rendezvous as illusions of Helen keep turning up to remind him that he isn't the type of man to be unfaithful to his

One of the best lines in the movie takes place when Tom McKenzie, an old rival, drops by unexpectedly. As Marilyn's character fixes breakfast in the kitchen, Richard does his best to prevent Tom from discovering her and possibly causing a scandal that could end his marriage.

Nevertheless, Tom becomes aware that there is someone else there and begins questioning Richard as to who he is hiding.

Flustered, but determined to keep Marilyn's character hidden, Richard finally blurts out, "Wouldn't you like to know? Maybe it's Marilyn

As Marilyn's character remains nameless throughout the movie, one may wonder if Richard is sharing his building with the famous actress and just doesn't realize it.

This film deals with a man's choice between his marriage and forbidden temptation. Behind the scenes, Marilyn's life was complicated by the collapse of her marriage to Joe DiMaggio. By the film's completion, the marriage of nine months had ended in divorce.

"It's no fun being married to an electric light," DiMaggio said of his famous marriage.

Marilyn, however, was not without companions; among them, the head of a European royal family. At the encouragement of Aristotle

Onassis, Prince Rainier of Monaco initiated a marriage proposal to Marilyn. Not surprisingly, Marilyn was interested and even agreed to meet the prince. Before the idea went much further, the announcement was made that the prince would marry another actress by the name of Grace

In addition, Marilyn also had a highly secretive affair with Marlon Brando. This relationship was also short-lived as playwright Arthur Miller announced plans to divorce his wife. Soon afterward, Miller's relationship with Marilyn became public. They were later married. The completion of "The Seven

Year Itch" brought a celebration that was taken by some to mean the acceptance of Marilyn Monroe into the Hollywood circle. Guests of the party included her previous co-stars, such as Lauren Bacall. The celebration also allowed Marilyn to meet her childhood idol and future co-star in The Misfits," Clark Gable.

"The Seven Year Itch" is best known for the famous Marilyn Monroe scene in which she stands over a subway grating while the breeze causes her dress to billow up around her; a scene that could've contributed to the actress's divorce from DiMaggio.

In the summer of 1955, shortly after completion of the film, Marilyn and friend Eli Wallach, who would later be her co-star in "The Misfits," watched as a 40-foot long poster of her most famous scene was erected on the side of a building.

Editor's Note: This is part six in a series of articles studying the life and career of Marilyn Monroe. Details about the actress' life come from "Goddess: The Secret Lives of Marilyn Monroe," by Anthony Summers.

Forestry students clean Bluemont Hill

By Stacie Sanders Collegian Reporter

Forestry students launched a clean-up effort on Bluemont Hill Wednesday in honor of Earth Day.

The students are enrolled in Use of Natural Resources for Leisure. The course is taught by Reinee Hildebrandt, assistant professor of forestry.

Hildebrandt said the class is studying different types of vandalism, and the clean-up effort fit in well with the course of study.

"What we are trying to do is make more of a statement than anything clse," said Don Kelly, junior in park resource management and student coordinator of the clean-up effort. "It isn't very hard for a group to get together and do a bit to clean up."

Hildebrandt said Bluemont Hill shows evidence of intentional vandalism through the litter of bottles, cans and other garbage around the

She said incidental vandalism is also evident on the hill. Incidental vandalism occurs when trails are not designed with basic human behavior in mind.

John Bond, junior in park resource management, said the class collected 172 pounds of glass, 250 pounds of scrap metal, one 55-gallon barrel of paper products and one trash bag of aluminum cans.

"I want to stress that I'm not putting blame on the city or blame on the Department (of Parks and Recreation)," she said. "It's just a typical type of situation that our students might be involved in (after entering the professional realm of resource management). Hildebrandt said the students will often face limited financial resources and will have situations where they must rely heavily on volunteer labor.

"This activity today provides them with an opportunity to become a volunteer and capture first-hand some of the pitfalls of volunteerism," she

In addition, Hildebrandt said the effort has been a good experience because the students have had an op-, portunity to go through the planning of the project.

Kelly said the class has been planning the project for two weeks.

To organize the clean-up effort, Hildebrandt said, the class divided into several committees including a public relations committee, a work force committee and an equipment

'Medea' begins second week

Euripides' play features many thought-provoking issues, rhetorical debates

By Donna Warren Collegian Reporter

Euripides' plays are famous for their rhetorical debates, and these debates are what make the K-State Players presentation of "Medea" dramatic and intellectually exciting.

The production incorporates various ideas that make it unique. The text is a verse adaptation that was written in 1946 by American poet, Robinson Jeffers, and uses a modern-style poetic structure. The costuming and staging of the pro-duction are relatively bare, but lessen the distraction from the characters and thought-provoking issues confronted in the play.

The issues center on Medea and her children, who have been abandoned by her husband, Jason. He is leaving her to marry the daughter of Creon, the Corinthian king. Once a princess, Medea fell in love with Jason when he came to her father's kingdom seeking the Golden Fleece. Medea used her sorcery and treachery to help Jason achieve his high stature in society, eventually killing her own brother and breaking ties with her father to do so.

Medea is enraged that she did all this for Jason and he is now abandoning her, leaving her to be regarded by the Greeks, as all foreigners are, as barbarians.

Although heard by the audience, Medea is not seen immediately in the opening act. Her anguished cries are heard by her nurse and three Corinthian women who have come to visit her. The women have arrived to find Medea in a distraught state - someone who has lost all will to live. She tells them of all she did for Jason and declares Greece to be "his home and my

Fearing her vengeance, Creon banishes Medea and her children from Corinth before she can harm his daughter, but allows her one final day in the city to gather her things. Medea uses it to plot her

As the plot unfolds, the play becomes a conflict between rational and irrational thinking. Medea is obsessed with hate and revenge, and declares, "Hate is a bottomless cup, and I will pour and pour."

She seeks revenge not only against Jason, but against the society by resorting to the "unthink-able." Not only does she kill Jason's new bride and Creon, but her own two children.

The role of Medea is considered to be one of theater's most difficult, but Maria Santucci, freshman in theater, proves herself more than capable of performing the role.

Santucci easily conveys Medca's constantly changing state of mind. She successfully makes the transition from a woman delirious with hate to a cunning and clever witch, and keeps the rhetorical dialogue alive and suspenseful. Santucci speaks the words clearly, quickly and with building emotion.

Also credible in his role of Jason is Dwight Tolar, junior in applied music, whose character is forceful and unintimidated by Medea's vengeance.

Music for the production was composed by Mike MacFarland, a senior at Manhattan High School and the son of the play's director, Charlotte MacFarland.

Science lab on wheels

College students, faculty use cruising camper to test air

By The Collegian Staff

A recreational vehicle drives down a long stretch of highway. The occupants are not a group of college students on their way to the lake, and they are not a family traveling to Disney World for

A group of student and faculty scientists from K-State is behind the wheel of this cruising camper.

The RV, which has a home be-hind King Hall, is a mobile laboratory, constructed and operated by the Department of Chemistry.

The chemistry department be-gan the project three years ago through funding from the Environmental Protection Agency. Marty Spartz, graduate student in chemistry, said the laboratory is used to measure toxics in the atmosphere.

"We go to any facility — like chemical plants and toxic waste sites - the EPA asks us to," Spartz said. "There are a number of other students and faculty involved, including EPA personnel, who are always at the site to help."

Sometimes at a site, the companies are not always overjoyed at the idea of the testing laboratory being there, he said. However, most chemical companies are opening up to projects of this sort to show the public they are not causing any Spartz said the EPA develops new protocols to determine the limit of a certain chemical or compound that should be in the atmosphere. The laboratory is then used to measure these compounds.

The first two years or so were spent building the system," Spartz said. "Now, we are doing testing experiments to see how accurate the readings are."

He said the method is an exact procedure that must be followed the same way every time it is used, so the data obtained is correct.

Robert Hammaker, professor of chemistry and co-adviser of the project, said the goal is to develop a reliable method for detecting compounds in the atmosphere. "One of the products of research is failure," Hammaker said. "You have to make a lot of mistakes to get it right. But you keep after it, and eventually you get there."

The laboratory's performance will be rated by the EPA to determine how the method is going to be used. Spartz said if the laboratory applications fall within a certain degree, it will become an EPA

"We're confident that it will. It's just that testing takes a while," Spartz said. "Nothing becomes a method overnight."

Hammaker said the students receive many benefits from working on the mobile laboratory project.

"It also gives them experience that makes them very employable at any level," he said. "A student who gets a degree and works on the project qualifies for university teaching positions, employment in private industries or even jobs in government laboratories.'

Hammaker said the project began by working with materials indoors and then evolved to conducting experiments outside. The final stage, he said, is going to sites to measure compounds and to test

"There are a lot of things that remain to be done," Hammaker said. "Working outdoors is a lot different than working in the lab, and we learn something we didn't already know, every time we go out."

Students aid fifth-graders in making of music videos

By Stacie Sanders Collegian Reporter

In the hustle and bustle of an elementary school hallway, aspiring young producers and directors at Woodrow Wilson School began producing their own music videos Wednesday with the assistance of K-State students.

Hilary McLellan, assistant professor of education technology, introduced the music video idea to a fifthgrade class taught by Melissa Hancock about three weeks ago.

McLellan said she showed the fifth-graders a music video from MTV and an example of a video collage made by a K-State student.

The fifth-grade students worked on drawings for a story sequence for the production with their art teacher, Ron Marstall, she said. In addition, they wrote their own scripts. They have been working for about two weeks.

"The focus is on telling a story with pictures," McLellan said. "Music is important, but it is secondary.'

"It's been neat to integrate art, music and writing," Hancock said. Hancock said once the students got an idea of what they wanted to do, the rest quickly fell into place.

Shawn Hetzler, a fifth-grade stu-dent in Hancock's class, said his group has been drawing pictures and cutting out and pasting figures on

"I'm excited. ... I'm not sure what's going to happen," he said. McLellan said video topics center around subjects such as missing the school bus or getting ready for

Shawn Harrelson, graduate student in adult and occupational continuing education, Nestor Melgarejo, graduate student in radio-television, and McLellan went to the school Wednesday to tape the videos. Only two of the seven vidoes could be taped at each session because of limited equipment, McLellan said. She said there are six K-State students helping with the project. All the students are in either the Instructional TV class or the Education Technology class.

"From here, the (K-State) students and I will take the tapes and use the editing equipment at the college to put the video together based on the scripts," McLellan said. Hancock said the teachers hope to learn from the experience to be able to help the children produce their own videos next year. The finished products will be shown to Hancock's class in about two weeks, McLellan said.

McLellan said she would like to see students in Manhattan or Kansas exchange video postcards with other schools around the country or in other countries. Video postcards are video segments about students and their schools, she said.

A media specialist with a school district in Juneau, Alaska, has expressed interest in the video postcard idea, McLellan said.

Tuttle plans discussed

Area residents suggest addition of marina, nature trails

By Monica Marcotte Collegian Reporter

Several issues, including the addition of a marina to the Tuttle Creek Reservoir, were discussed during a meeting conducted by the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks Wednesday night.

The meeting was for the KDWP to gain input and ideas for a 25-year long-range management plan concerning Tuttle Creek Lake and surrounding wildlife areas. This area consists of more than 12,000 acres, said Bill Porter, unit supervisor for Tuttle Creek.

A crowd of about 40 interested citizens voiced their concerns about present and future uses of the state

Area residents from Randolph, Leonardville, Lenexa, Marysville, and Manhattan were in attendance, along with several employees of the KDWP from Topeka.

A Tuttle Creek Committee was formed, consisting of members of the Fish and Wildlife Departments, Parks and Public Lands Division and the park's law enforcement division.

Those in attendance were divided into groups to write down their ideas which were later presented individually.

Ted Cable, associate professor of forestry, was at the meeting.

"Being part of the park management curriculum, I take a professional and personal interest in this. I have a need to know what is going on," Cable said.

He expressed his interest in having more nature trails around the park.

Being part of the park management curriculum, I take a professional and personal interest in this. I have a need to know what is going on.

-Ted Cable Associate Professor of Forestry

This idea was met favorably, but the issue with the most interest was the addition of a marina to Tuttle Creek. Several areas were suggested, including one in Tuttle Cove, but the possibility for one in the very near future still looks dim. Funding remains

Among the suggestions were: raising the conservation pool ten feet to make certain areas more accessible by boat, building a boat ramp in the upper two-thirds of the lake, developing a dump station and consistent water system in the Fancy Creek State Park Area, adding new wetlands, including duck marshes, and enlarging of the Tuttle Creek parking

Other ideas suggested were strict enforcement of parking permits year round and turning the River Pond Area into a "no wake" boating area.

Spencer Tomb, associate professor of biology, said he saw a need for programs to educate K-State students on areas available for hunting and fishing. Tomb also had a personal interest in preserving the wetlands as a prime area for duck hunting.

Rob Ladner, an employee of the KDWP, said the first priority of Tuttle Creek is to serve as a flood control measure.

"Flood control is Tuttle's reason for existence, and it will always have first priority in regard to wildlife and recreation issues," Ladner said.

Funding for these proposed projects will be budgeted into fiscal year 1993 budget after approval from the Legislature, Porter said.

Developing countries have not done anything about deforestation because industrialized countries have not offered them viable economic alternatives to tearing down the forests, Law said. For now, they see the destruction as the only means for their survival.

Law also talked about the problem of overpopulation. He said the Earth is already near carrying capacity. Carrying capacity is the maximum population the planet can sustain given its limited resources. "A good planet is hard to find,"

Brett Vuillemin, K-State's bright spot, recorded two rounds of oneover-par 71 to finish the first day in third place. Tied with Vuillemin is Craig Hainline, Oklahoma State, and Jeff Lee, Oklahoma.

'I'm very proud of Brett (Vuillemin). If he could hold on or move up in the individual standings, it would be something he would remember for the rest of his life," Bunker said. "To be in third after 36-holes and playing this well at a prestigious event on a great course, is just a compliment to the outstanding accomplishments of

A couple of the 'Cats ran into some problems strategically on their attack of the course. Bunker called a team meeting to discuss some of those things late last night.

"I just wanted them to know that we are still in a great position to take third, and we shouldn't lose sight of that," he said.

The Wildcats are just 10 strokes behind Kansas and Colorado which are currently tied for third at 596.

Elsewhere in the K-State lineup Richard Laing was in 11th at 73-74—147, Jeff Sedorcek is 29th at 81-73-154, Chris Thompson is 39th at 78-87-165, and Brad Stephens is 40th at 79-92-171.

The Wichita Eagle also reported that point guard Marcus Zeigler of Independence Community College plans to sign with K-State. The 5-10 product of Wichita South averaged 10 points and seven assists last year at Independence.

A tcammate of Zeigler's on a Class 6A state championship team at South — Val Barnes — is expected to make a campus visit this weekend. Altman would not confirm Barnes' visit because of NCAA rules prohibiting college coaches from making public comments about recruits.

Barnes could be the prized plum of the recruiting class if he signs with K-State. The 6-2 guard from Butler County Community College averaged over 18 points a game last season. He has already made visits to Kansas and Oklahoma, and the K-State visit would be his final stop.

His scoring explosiveness — 35 points against Connors State (Okla.) in the first round of the national juco tourney - has spurred the interest of coaches at several Division I schools.

Walker said the only way K-State would receive the full adjustment would be a raise in taxes, which could happen during this session.

"We may have to raise sales tax, adjust income tax and/or cut some sales tax exemptions," he said.

Hirsch said they stayed at the camp for about 30 minutes. During that time, Hirsch explored the prison barracks and the bunks in which prisoners were forced to sleep. The narrow wooden bunks were placed in tiers of four, with about two feet of clearance between bunks, he said.

"They reminded me of the feed bunks we had back on the farm," he Hirsch also took photographs of the emaciated survivors and the piles of corpses.

His group did not go inside the underground factory, Hirsch said. He later discovered the facility had 31 miles of railroad track serving the factory. Hirsch said he could not detect any evidence of this excavation while he was at the camp.

Hirsch said he was especially affected by what he saw in Nordhausen because of his Jewish ancestory.

Hirsch has been active in Holocaust Remembrance activities for several years. In 1981, he was the Kansas representative to the National United States Holocaust Memorial Council in Washington, D.C. There he received a certificate signed by Elie Wiesel, who earned the Nobel Peace Prize for writing about the Holocaust.

Hirsch said at the invitation of Gov. Mike Hayden, he is going to Topeka today for a commemorative service for Holocaust victims.

Hirsch said he is bewildered by those who deny the horror of the Holocaust.

Omnibus bill passes unamended

Senate fails to approve enrollment adjustment that would increase University funds 75 percent

By Chris Koger

An amendment intended to restore some enrollment adjustment funding to Board of Regents schools failed after a lengthy debate in the state Senate Thursday, just one day after K-State students lobbied at the Statehouse for the funding.

The amendment, sponsored by would have given the University 75 percent of the enrollment adjustment funds, or $962,773 more than the $2.58 million proposed by the Legislature.

Oleen's amendment would have tacked the enrollment adjustment onto an omnibus financing bill, which is a catchall appropriations

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, measure the Legislature passes as its final act of the session. The bill the Senate passed without the amendment.

"I don't think anyone voted against it because they are against higher education," Oleen said. "The main reason is the problem of identifying where the money would come

The probability of the House adding the money to the omnibus appropriations bill is small, because it has already voted against any of the adjustment funds being given to the regents schools, she said.

Currently, the regents budget is before a conference committee.

budget, but nothing here is sacred," she said. "We just don't have the dollars to fund it all."

"I hope we can protect the regents

The amendment's failure was a disappointment, Oleen said.

"I think our priorities are not right. It's a matter of finding revenue sources, and right now the department (of Social and Rehabilitation Services) budget is $77 million over budget, and it's an on-going program," she said. "I think the priorities are kneejerk reactions instead of reactions that are planned out."

Mike Steinle, state and community affairs director for Student Body President Todd Johnson, said he will continue to travel to the Statehouse for support.

"I appreciate (Oleen's) efforts, she has done a good job for us," Steinle said. "I plan to go to Topeka Tuesday and talk to some representatives to see what can still be done."

Steinle said Johnson's lobbying team hasn't advocated any specific plans for where the funding should

"That's not our job, we're just asking for funding which will allow quality funding," he said. "Personally, I feel the money could come from a sales tax, but I'm not the one making the decisions.'

Steinle and more than 250 other K-State students met with legislators Wednesday to support the enrollment adjustment. Oleen said the ef-

Sam Knipp closes the hanger housing one of the club's five airplanes at Manhattan Municipal Airport. Membership dues serve as stock in the club and enable each certified pilot to fly the club's planes.

Hugh Irvin, flight instructor, advises Sam Knipp, K-State Flying Club vice president, during his simulator training.

Club membership increases

Alumni, students, faculty practice piloting on regular basis

By Chris McEntee Collegian Reporter

Piloting an airplane is a rare occasion for the average person, but members of the K-State

Flying Club do it all the time. The club has five planes and is looking into the possibility of obtaining a sixth, said Judy Marshall, president. The goal is to have 13 active members per plane. The club looks at the actual amount of people who fly on a regular basis and try to determine a ratio between planes and members, she said.

As of March 20, the club had 77 members. Of the members, 29 are students, 19 are faculty or staff, and 29 are alumni, said Mark Wuertz, treasurer.

Wuertz said that between 1982 and 1985 membership slumped, but recently the club has seen an increase in membership.

"The flying club is becoming so popular that we have a waiting list of 19 applicants," said Sam Knipp, vice president.

The initial cost of club membership is $128, which pays for processing, insurance, dues and stock in the club planes, Wuertz said. The $100 for stock in the planes is refundable if the member drops out from the club.

"Each member must fly one hour per month, and if you fly more than that, then you are charged according to your extra flight time," Marshall said. "You try and fly as much as you can to keep in practice."

The airplanes are kept in a hangar at the Manhattan Municipal Airport, she said. When members want time on a plane, they call Spicer Aircraft Inc. and reserve a time.

"There is no set amount of time members have to fly, but you must practice three takeoffs and landings in 90 days, or you are no longer current and must have an instructor with you to carry passengers," Marshall said.

"Student pilots are never allowed to carry a passenger because they do not yet have a license," Knipp said.

Members in the club trying to get a private pilot's license are matched with instructors, Wuertz said. About 15 people are approved to be instructors, and five or six instruct on a regular basis, he said.

Once the member has an instructor, the member takes a medical exam, a written exam about halfway through the training program and then a final practical flying exam for the Federal Aviation Administration to prove he or she has learned how to fly, Wuertz said.

He said student pilots usually fly within 100 miles of the Manhattan area, but the licensed pilots will fly anywhere there is an airport.

"I have flown to Arizona, but usually I fly to Western Kansas a lot, because I do most of my business out that way, and it is faster than trying to drive," Knipp said.

Knipp said he has been trying to fly at least two times a week because he is trying to get his instruments reading license along with his commercial pilot license. An instruments license allows the pilot to fly in poor visibility, relying completely on the dashboard instruments. The commercial license enables a pilot to fly for hire, he said.

"The whole purpose of the organization is to promote flying," Wuertz said.

Records, resident have different accounts of 911 fire report

By Margaret Clarkin Collegian Reporter

A resident of Evergreen Apartments said he called 911 at about 3:30 a.m. April 19 to report the early morning fire that destroyed several apartments at the complex. Records at the Riley County Police Department, however, show that the call reporting the fire at 1122-1126 Gardenway came at 3:56

"I thought it was early when I woke to the sounds of guys screaming in the parking lot," said Jim Cunningham, a resident of the apartment complex.

Cunningham said his clock read

"I looked to the parking lot, saw a reflection of a guy and I heard crackling," he said. Cunningham said he was awake and could tell that it was a fire. After a few minutes to adjust to what was conversation.

happening, he called 911. He said it couldn't have been more than 10 minutes before he made the call.

Larry Woodyard, assistant director of RCPD, said the RCPD has a computer printout of all 911 calls received. The printout showed that the RCPD did not receive a 911 call reporting the fire until 3:56 a.m., and had not recieved any 911 calls between 3:21 and 3:56 a.m. The records showed that numerous other people had called to report the fire after 3:56 a.m., yet none of them were from Cunningham.

"If he called, it would be recorded here," Woodyard said. "I am confident based on this (computer printout) that he did not call 911." The RCPD is the only place in Manhattan that receives 911 calls. Cunningham said he did not leave his name with the dispatcher, but that she was the one who ended the

"She just said 'Thanks, we'll get on it," he said.

David Walker, a resident of the complex, said in the April 20 Collegian that he also heard screams outside around the same time. "Around 3:30 a.m., I heard someone screaming and hollering for us to get out of the building," Walker said. "When I came out only the second stairwell was on fire. My apartment was a little smoky.

Walker was living in a unit that was destroyed by the fire.

Woodyard said that with each call the police receive the dispatcher runs through a list of questions, including where the fire is and whether any people are in the building, as part of standard procedure.

"We would ask his name and he would have to refuse to give it," he said. "It's standard procedure.

Senate hears resolution on alcohol consumption

By Kirk Caraway Staff Reporter

Student Senate heard first readings on a resolution recommending the University allow alcohol to be consumed in the KSU Stadium parking lot and to permit beer sales inside the stadium.

The bill originally only dealt with consumption of alcohol in the stadium parking lot, but was amended by the sponsors to include the sale of cereal malt beverages in the stadium.

"We think the regents might be more likely to pass it with this on it," said David McIntyre, engineering senator. McIntyre said other regents schools, such as Wichita State, sell beer at sporting events. Bill Nelson, chairman of the said many alumni who attend football games regularly have tailgate parties where alcohol is served, which is in violation of the current

Also added to the resolution' were sections dealing with cordoning off the area in the parking lot to be designated open for alcohol consumption and security measures to deal with underage

If passed, the resolution would be referred to President Jon Wefald and the Board of Regents for their approval.

Senate also approved the appointments of three students to the Educational Opportunity Fund committee. Those approved are Todd Giefer, engineering senator; Athletic Ticket Sales committee, Carlotte Moore, sophomore in pre-law; and Fehmi Malik, freshman in electrical engineering.

Other appointments approved were Doug McIver, freshman in engineering, to serve as elections committee chair and Shannon Malone, business senator, as chair of student affairs and social services standing committee.

Rosalind Fisher, director of personnel services, gave a presentation during open period on living and communicating in a multicultural society. Fisher showed senators a videotape illustrating the problems that personal biases and stereotyping can cause and how to avoid them. She told senators that everyone would benefit if they create an environment comfortable to women and minorities.

De Chamorro faces first crisis

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP) — President Violeta Barrios de Chamorro encountered a political crisis in her first full day in office Thursday for allowing the Sandinistas to retain temporary control of the army and security forces.

Her decision to be her own defense minister but to allow Gen. Humberto Ortega to stay on as army chief drew fire from rebel leaders and split her coalition in the national legislature. Ortega is the brother of former Sandinista President Daniel Ortega is the brother of former Sandinista President Daniel Ortega.

Two ministers Chamorro had named to her Cabinet refused to serve as long as Humberto Ortega remained. Rebel leaders refused to surrender their weapons to United Nations peacekeepers and talked about taking to the hills and renewing their war against the Sandinistas.

A news conference scheduled for 11 a.m. by Chamorro was canceled without explanation and she remained out of sight for most of the day.

Journalists' telephone calls to the presidential office went unanswered.

Immediately after her inauguration Wednesday, Chamorro abolished the unpopular compulsory military service that forced youths into the Sandinista army to fight a nine-year war against the U.S.-backed rebels, known as Contras.

Arms control adviser resigns

WASHINGTON (AP) — Edward L. Rowny quit Thursday as a senior arms control adviser to President Bush. Sources said Rowny resigned over what he felt was undue haste in completing a treaty with the Soviet Union to limit strategic nuclear missiles.

Bush accepted Rowny's resignation with deep regret and said he had always valued his adviser's candor and loyalty.

"You have served as one of the principal architects of the American policy of peace through strength," Bush said in a letter to the 73-year-old, retired Army lieutenant general.

Rowny, who will leave his post on June 30, said in a statement that he looked forward "to contributing to his (Bush's) efforts for peace through strength."

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said Rowny had authorized him to say there was no disagreement or reason to leave other than a desire to take a position outside government.

But the sources, who spoke only on the condition of anonymity, said Rowny disagreed with Secretary of State James A. Baker III over Baker's pushing to complete the treaty at what Rowny felt was too fast a pace.

Study finds 'octane cheating'

WASHINGTON (AP) — Some service stations pass off regular gasoline as higher-priced super premium, according to a congressional study Thursday that said "octane cheating" may be costing motorists $150 million a year.

The report by the General Accounting Office estimated that 9 percent of gasoline sold nationwide is mislabeled by half an octane number or more. And in several states where pump testing has actually proven mislabeling, the federal government has done little to stop the deception, the report said.

The GAO, the investigative arm of Congress, said motorists who think they are buying premium grades may be losing $150 million a year.

But Rep. Philip R. Sharp, D-Ind., who along with Rep. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., released the report, said the study was conservative and losses could reach as high as $600 million through growing mislabeling of octane ratings at the pump.

Cheney calls for military cuts

WASHINGTON (AP) — Defense Secretary Dick Cheney on Thursday called for slashing Pentagon plans for the B-2 stealth bomber and other sophisticated aircraft, citing a diminishing Soviet threat.

Cheney, pressed by congressional Democrats to cut military spending in response to rapid changes in Europe, testified his blueprint would trim $2.4 billion from President Bush's $307 billion defense budget for 1991 and would save $34.8 billion through 1997.

In addition to cutting the proposed number of B-2 bombers from 132 to 75, Cheney said he intends to cut planned purchases of the C-17 long-range transport plane and the Navy's A-12 attack aircraft, and to delay purchases of the Air Force's Advanced Tactical Aircraft and the Advanced Tactical Fighter.

The chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis., commended Cheney for "coming to grips with some things he clearly needs to come to grips with" but said he didn't go far enough.

High school blast injures 16

RICHMOND (AP) — Fifteen students and a teacher were hurt shortly before noon Thursday when a chemistry experiment exploded in a classroom at Central Heights High School.

Most of the injured were taken to Ransom Memorial Hospital

Franklin County Sheriff's Capt. Craig Davis said two were hurt seriously and the others suffered minor injuries.

Most of the injuries appeared to be cuts from flying glass.

School officials gave no explanation for the explosion.

A student who suffered minor injuries told an Anderson County medical technician that the blast occurred when the class mixed ethyl alcohol with oxygen and someone threw a match into the five-gallon glass container.

Eldon Burgess, Central Heights media specialist, said he was eating lunch in the teacher's lounge when the explosion occurred in the biological sciences room next door.

Grandmother graduates

McCUNE (AP) — Helen Stewart will get a degree from Labette Community College 12 days before her 77th birthday because she went back to the books after a dare from her grandson.

"He decided he didn't want to take his senior year and finish up school," Stewart said of grandson Scott Hammonds. "I said, 'Yes, yes, you need an education, I found that out a long time ago.' And he started teasing me, why didn't I get mine with him?"

The two will be together May 3 for the graduation ceremony.

"They told us we get caps and gowns and be like the big folks," she said.

Ward, many honored

Office workers rewarded during National Secretary's Week

By Chris McEntee Collegian Reporter

Marie Ward, a secretary in the plant pathology department, is one of the many secretaries at the University who were honored by their supervisors during National Sectretaries Week.

Fred Schwenk, professor of plant pathology and department head, gave each secretary in the office a card and took them to lunch at the Plum Tree restaurant to celebrate the week.

"A couple of faculty members also gave each of the secretaries a violet plant," Ward said.

Ward has worked at the University for a little more than 35 years. A Manhattan native, Ward said she began working as a receptionist in the Placement Center in 1954. In 1965, she transferred to become a secretary in the botany and plant pathology department in the College of Agriculture, she said. "When I first started the job, we were working on Saturdays as well ing journal manuscripts and grant as the weekdays for a total of 44 hours a week, now we are on a strictly 40-hour-a-week basis,' Ward said.

In 1967, the official department title was changed to Plant Pathology and Ward has worked there ever

"We started off in Dickens Hall until 1981, and then Throckmorton Hall was completed," she said. "We have the entire fourth floor and close to 25 to 30 faculty members we work with."

On March 21, Ward was awarded a 35-year pin at the 13th annual Classified Employee Recognition Ceremony.

There are only a couple of faculty members who have been here as long or longer than I have," she said. "When I first started the job, I took a lot of notes in shorthand. With the technology today there is not much of a need to use shorthand."

Ward said her duties include typ-propsals, as well as some bookkeeping.

"Marie is the best typist that I've ever been around," said Larry Claflin, professor of plant pathology and former department head.

Claflin said Ward is the only one he wants to finalize his papers and grant proposals because she knows the formats that are required for the different publications.

"I first knew her when she didn't even have an electronic typewriter," he said. "She was just as good and helpful then as she is today."

Claflin said Ward is like a mother to the graduate students in the department. She helps them out when they are feeling homesick, and has kept more than one from returning

"I enjoy what I do for the plant pathology department," she said. Our faculty and staff really do appreciate us around here, they just don't always tell us."

Marie Ward, secretary in the plant pathology office, has worked for K-State since 1954. On March 21, Ward was awarded her 35-year service pin at an employee recognition ceremony.

Admissions fee decreases enrollment applications

By Lori Stauffer Collegian Reporter

There is a significant drop in freshman applications for enrollment for the fall, according to the admissions office.

University officials blame the decrease on a fee for incoming students, implemented by the Board of Regents this year.

"The basic reason (for the decrease) is the admissions fee. We've never had it before," said Don Foster, registrar.

A smaller pool of Kansas high school graduates this year and a larger number of students choosing to attend community colleges because of weak economies are other reasons given for the decrease. However, the admissions fee, implemented in January, seems to be the main culprit, administrators apply actually enroll at K-State, and the Kansas Board of Regents thought this percentage was too

To decrease the number of multiple applications, the Regents approved a $15 fee last year.

Knowing the fee was pending prepared administrators for the decrease.

"We knew in advance the applications for admissions would be down because of the application fee," Provost James Coffman said.

The majority of the universities governed by the Kansas Board of Regents are reporting an application decrease and K-State is about even with their numbers, Elkins

"We're about the same as the rest of the schools under the Regents. We've experienced a 20 to Dick Elkins, director of under- 30 percent drop in enrollment," he graduate admissions, said only ab- said. "The fee cuts the number of out 60 percent of the freshman who casual shoppers down. The admissions process take a lot of time and effort and this encourages only those who are seriously interested to apply.

Although the number of admissions is down, administrators said they expect to see enrollment remaining steady in the fall.

"K-State will capture the same share of those going on to college,' said Don Hoyt, director of planning and evaluation services. "Projections for fall 1990 aren't going to be affected.'

Coffman said the decrease in student applications would more evenly compare with the number of classes the administration will have to cut because of the enrollment adjustment reductions proposed by Legislature.

"They wanted to decrease the number of multiple admissions with the fee, and the number has dropped," Elkins said.

Speaker visits Panama

Delegation sent to review invasion, U.S. troop abuses

By Donna Warren Collegian Reporter

There was no justification under international law for the United States' invasion of Panama, said Cathleen Connealy in a lecture Wednesday night sponsored by the Manhattan Alliance on Central America.

Connealy, an attorney from Kansas City, is treasurer of the National Lawyers Guild and was part of a fivemember human rights delegation sent to Panama by the guild.

She said the delegation was sent to determine if the invasion was justified under international law, the true cost of the invasion and to investigate reports of U.S. troop abuses of human rights.

The delegation spoke with many people in Panama including hospital workers, union leaders, journalists, prisoners and embassy workers. She said the people were usually not hesitant to talk to them and were open and direct with their comments.

Connealy said she was amazed by the amount of destruction she saw, describing it as terrible. She said the areas hardest hit were the poorest and most densely populated.

One area she saw was completely flattened by more than 400 bombs that were dropped on the first night of the invasion.

Connealy said the United States officially reported only 202 Panama civilians killed in the invasion. Based on what the delegation observed, she said the group concluded this figure was very low.

She said this was determined by the amount of destruction they saw, the visits with hospital workers and the mass graves they located.

The delegation knew of ten mass grave sites, and visited one with more than 200 bodies in it alone. She said she found it hard to believe that if more than 16,000 people had been left homeless, only 202 had been officially killed.

Connealy said hiding the true number of civilians killed was one of tics. Other tactics included the printing of T-shirts reading "Just Cause" and educational programs on democracy.

Connealy said when the delegation wanted to find out if the people were opposed to the invasion, they discovered that most of them were not opposed to it. She said this is due to the history of the relationship between the United States and Panama.

While Panama is sovereign in name, it has never been truly independent," she said.

Opposition to the invasion included human rights groups, some government employees and people who lost their homes. Connealy said the homeless felt they had not done anything to deserve what had happened to them.

The National Lawyers Guild also found no justification under international law for the invasion. She said the "self-defense" reason given by President Bush was not valid. International law states this to be justified only if "under attack or if there is an the United States' propaganda tac- imminent threat of attack," she said.

Protestors needed to meet with regents

"You don't ever know what's going to happen during any show. But any new challenge is good. I just love to be with the crowd!" -Donnie, New Kids on the Block.

aving taken part in Wednesday's protest at the Statehouse, I think I understand what the New Kids are trying to teach me. Dealing with the heavily factioned Kansas House is definitely a challenge, and it was fun to be a part of the crowd that descended on the Statehouse. It was also fun when we got to make noise in the House Chamber when they introduced Jack Hartman and Veryl Switzer as inductees into the Kansas Sports Hall of Fame.

We didn't get to speak directly to most House members about our enrollment adjustment, but we did get to make our presence known. They knew who we were, and they knew we were there. I assume they're smart enough to know why we were there.

Still though, I couldn't help but feel that we were misdirecting our energy, that there was someone else we should be complaining to. There is, of course. All 250 to 300 of us probably should have hopped on over to the offices of the Board of Regents and payed Stanley Koplik a little visit.

Koplik has never been one of my favorite state officials. I've always found him to be a Dwayne bit two-faced - I mean that in its most re- Lively spectful sense, just as when I say Pol Pot is my favorite dictator - but that is another issue. My new problem with Koplik is that I think his priorities are a bit skewed.

As Rep. Sheila Hochhauser pointed out in a Collegian guest column earlier in the week, part of K-State's problem in getting the full enrollment adjustment has been that the Board of Regents have put us sixth on the list of their top 10 priorities. As a result, the rest of the regents schools have been slow, if not reluctant, to take up our cause, citing the low priority of K-State as their reason. Some schools have even been lobbying against us for the same reason.

The question then becomes, "What are these other priorities?" If they are funding for other schools, then the system is inequitable, because it's unfair that one regents school would be asked, because of its low priority, to take a heavy cut in its enrollment adjustments, or be used to help balance the state budget, while other schools get full funding. Surely the regents staff would never support such a system. It would seem that schools which are a part of the same governing system would be treated equally. If one school gets cut, they should all be cut, and vice versa. If an unfair system did exist, surely Stanley Koplik would be on television every night doing interviews trying to help out the school or schools getting the short end of the stick.

Koplik has done something like that before. When he was pushing for his favorite pet project, his selective, closed, qualified admissions bill, he was on television almost every night for two weeks. Now that one of the regents schools runs the risk of losing a large portion of the money it was promised, I have dibility, they must at least give the appearyet to even read a quote from Koplik about the issue, or any issue for that matter. If the priorities earning a ranking above K-State are so important, why haven't I heard him pushing for them, or even acknowledging that the money was secure?

Where is Koplik?

here are the members of the Board of Regents themselves, for that matter, since they are supposed to be in charge of all their schools? Regent Hostetler appears to be the only one who questioned and attempted to change the list of priorities. All students, K-State or otherwise, should thank him for being active and on top of his

The other members of the board may be active, but we have yet to hear from them. I've often wondered if they even know what their staff is up to sometimes. I'm not sure they do. If they did, Stanley Koplik, the head of the regents staff, would not appear to be such an important figure. His position is important, but if the regents want to keep any sort of creance that they are in charge. Instead, Koplik himself seems to be a member of the board and even appears to be in charge. Something should be done about this, or the regents should be eliminated for being a powerless group and a waste of money.

Personally, I'd prefer the regents hang around a while. I'd rather see Koplik gone.

So, despite the noise that was made in the House chambers during the protest, we didn't do all we could. Noise should have been made inside and outside of the offices of the

In the end though, I have to go to New Kids for guidance. Donnie says that he'd "like to meet Mikhail Gorbachev (the leader of the Soviet Union)" and "talk about the situation in the world and try to make peace." Likewise, I'd like to meet with Stanley Koplik and give him a chance to set the record straight, not only with me and all K-Staters, but with all regents students. Perhaps he and I could even make peace.

Progressive legislators not found in Kansas

Welcome to Kansas, the only state that punishes its students for participating in the democratic process.

For caring about the quality of education they receive.

For actually thinking that state legislators realize how important a quality education is to the future of the state and its citizens.

The Senate's rejection of an amendment increasing the amount of K-State's enrollment adjustment Thursday was bad enough. But the arguments used to defeat it added insult to injury.

For one, senators criticized the nearly 300 students who lobbied tators" and said they were using "pressure tactics" to get more funding. In fact, he told senators that if they bowed to the students' "treatment," they would be "threatened again and again."

Terrorists at K-State. Who would have believed it. The students must have had Molotov cocktails hidden behind those signs they were carrying Wednesday.

Bogina also compared the funding K-State received to that KU received in the past nine years according to the enrollment adjustment formula established by the Legislature in 1986. By that time, KU had for all practical purposes attained its peak enrollment level, and still received $3.63 million compared to K-State's $3.65 million.

KU may have indeed had almost five times more new students overall during the past nine years, as Bogina asserted, but not in the past four, when the enrollment adjustment formula was implemented.

"It's wrong," Bogina told the senators. "Compare the numbers."

Let's talk numbers.

K-State could cut 300 or more class sections. It has absolutely nothing to do with KU's numbers. K-State was following the Legislature's own formula, which wasn't based on comparisons — only

In four years, President Jon Wefald did fulfill the mission that the Wednesday for an increase in the Board of Regents set for him - to recommended enrollment adjust- reverse K-State's declining enrollment. Sen. Gus Bogina, R- ment and stop the "brain-drain" of Shawnee, called the students "agi- the state's top students — and accomplished it according to the rules set by the regents and the

> But now the Legislature has decided to disregard the rules, leaving K-State bitterly facing a worse position than it was when Wefald was hired. Four years of hard work in trying to improve the quality of one of the state's educational institutions has been wasted.

"Are you better off than you were four years ago?"

And the injustice should be remembered during this election year and beyond, so that Kansans will elect progressive leaders, not ones who accept such absurd debate and who are comfortable with letting the quality of the state institutions and its people regress.

Editor,

I recently have gone to two movies at the K-State Union, "The Last Temptation of Christ" and "Romero." It seems to me that the attendance at these two shows is a measure of the level of our concern for the two issues. The house was packed for "Temptation," but there were only 20 or so people watching "Romero." This is very disturbing to me.

I went to see "Temptation" to see what all the fuss was about, just as did many others, I'm sure. Having been raised in the Christian tradition, I was interested to see this story that so many vocal Christians found to be distasteful or heretical. I personally was not at all offended by the movie and found it to have some historic points that seemed to be well taken. Anyway, Jesus liked to use stories to express his ideas and I think would respect anyone else's right to do so. On the other hand, if Christians take seriously the message of Jesus that speaks of peace, nonviolence and justice, why is it that the murders of Archbishop Romero and 70,000 other people in El Salvador by a U.S.-backed government are not of vital concern? If we are worried about defaming the name of Jesus, we better look at ourselves, not at a moviemaker or author of a controversial story. Most of the elite/government/ military in El Salvador probably consider themselves to be Christian, as do most of our representatives in Washington. Yet these are the forces that have carried on a virtual reign of terror for 10 years in El Salvador. But the blame does not stop there. How many U.S. Christians this month filed their annual tax return, formalizing our collusion in the activities of the government? The blood of the Salvadoran people is on our hands. Every day, for the past 10 years, the U.S. government has sent $1.5 million dollars to the government of El Salvador, in addition to weapons and military advisers. This continued assault on humanity is what is defaming to the name of Jesus and to the name of human decency.

The Salvadoran people are not the only victims of U.S. policy in Central America. It is estimated that 10 million people in the United States are homeless; poverty and hunger are worse today than anytime in the 1970s. Our children, who constitute the largest group of people in poverty, are being robbed daily of opportunity and justice by a government that continues to send billions of dollars to other governments who use it to subjugate their own people. As Archbishop Romero said, "Someone has to be willing to say 'Enough!'" Before one more of our tax dollars goes to support the repression and murder in El Salvador, we must say "Enough!" Contact your representatives. Contact President Bush. For the sake of human life, both in the Unites States and in El Salvador, say "Enough!"

Effort hindered

Editor,

I would like to express my gratitude toward some professors on campus. To all the teachers who planned tests for Wednesday, thank you. To all the teachers who recently decided to schedule pop quizzes for Wednesday, again thank you. You are working hard to stop the student movement for a better K-State. You did a fine job in preventing the state Legislature from hearing the concerns of thousands of voters. Yes, classroom attendance is important, however there are times when exceptions need to be made. Many groups on campus worked hard for a large turn out at the Capitol. We are working hard to prevent huge budget cuts that are facing the University. There is one source that can stop participation; teachers and professors. To the teachers who worked against us; may it be your classes that are cancelled for next year because of budget cuts.

What comes around, goes around.

dream come true is what many wish work could be. For Terry and Sara Rempel, who are potters, that is what work is.

They are the owners of the Potters Sweel, a pottery business in which they make each piece of pottery themselves in their basement.

"We make pottery because we love to work the clay," Terry Rempel said. "It's wonderful to be able to create and make a living at it."

Both trace their interest in ceramics to their days as students. "I got interested in ceramics back in 1980," Terry Rempel said. "I was a student at K-State, and I took four years of ceramics. I then left K-State and got into a welding program. I got into welding so that I would be able to make all of our equipment."

"Our business is like a dream come true for me," Sara Rempel said. "I've been interested in ceramics since high school. I then graduated from K-State with a degree in art education. I thought after I graduated that I would have to teach and do ceramics only on the side, but we've been fortunate enough to have our own pottery

"I spent a year and a half in an apprenticeship to learn more about the pottery business," Terry Rempel said. "You really learn a lot in an apprenticeship, more than they teach you in college." The Rempels started the Potters Sweel in 1986.

"We built most of our equipment from scratch. Many of our raw materials came from the junk yard," Terry Remple said. "My first piece of equipment that I constructed was our kiln, which I built in my parents' back yard before we started our business. Since then, I've built our gas kiln, pug mill, clay mixer, work tables, display tables, extruder and slab roller.'

The Rempels make mostly kitchen and dining ware, such as mugs, plates, bowls and other variations. They also take special They exhibit and sell their work at fairs and art shows, Terry Re-mpel said. "The fairs and art shows are easier to sell at because the people are there to buy and you are there to sell," he said.

"We've been to shows across the country," said Sara Rempel. "We just got back from a show in Florida. We go to about 25 different shows a year. When we aren't at a show, we're working on stocking up for our next one." Terry Rempel said that several processes are involved in making pottery. "First of all, we must make the clay," he said. "It comes in a dry powder so it must be blended."

Blended clay goes through the pug mill to remove air bubbles, he said. After the air bubbles are removed, the clay is cut into shape. Then it is thrown.

"To throw the clay is when you actually put the clay into the shape of what you are making," he said.

Next, the piece must go through a process of drying, trimming, bisqueing, waxing and glazing before it goes into the kiln, Terry Rempel said.

After the clay has been fired in the kiln, it is allowed to cool, he said.

Finally, the pottery is ready to be sold, he said. Sara Rempel said that business is going well.

"It is really exciting because people are starting to come back and be repeat purchasers," she said. The Potters Sweel is located at 1710 Laramie St.

Sara Rempel carves an edge into the base of a pot on a motorized wheel which her husband Terry built from junkyard parts.

Wichita State scores 7 runs in first inning to knock off Wildcats

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

The last pregame hot dog hadn't even been consumed before this one was over.

Defending national champion Wichita State scored seven runs in the first inning and hung on to down K-State 8-5 at Frank Myers Field Thursday night.

The Shocker outburst off Wildcat starter and loser David Hierholzer, 6-3, put a damper on the spirits of the 6,155 assembled to watch two of Kansas' three Division I schools battle on the diamond.

The crowd was the largest to ever witness a college baseball game in Kansas, and was a good 2,500 better than the previous largest crowd ever to witness a K-State home contest.

"I thought we had a good start tonight and didn't do particularly much after that," said Wichita State coach Gene Stephenson.

The start, however, was enough. Hierholzer struggled with his slider early — it was spinning rather than breaking - and as a result he was missing the strike zone with great regularity. When he found it, it was to the benefit of Shocker hitters.

A walk and a pair of singles, followed by another base on balls, brought the first Wichita State run

The Shockers then sent third baseman Pat Meares to the plate, and he promptly delivered a backbreaking, grand slam homer over the fence in left-center field to give WSU a 5-0 lead.

Meares said the blow broke K-State's spirit, and the spirit of its

"I think the grand slam really broke his back," he said. "He just missed a pitch and I was sitting back looking for something away.

"I was seeing the ball really well tonight. That inning was big because I think we took their crowd out of the game early."
Wichita State added two additional runs before Kent Hipp came out of the K-State bullpen to end the K-State coach Mike Clark said Hierholzer's troubles were something his ace would overcome.

Team takes weekend off from Big 8

By The Collegian Staff K-State takes its turn as the idle Big Eight Conference team this weekend, but will play host to the Northern Colorado Bears Saturday and Sunday at Frank Myers Field.

The Wildcats, 24-18 over-all and second place in the league at 10-6, will play a pair of seven-inning games begin-ning at 3 p.m. Saturday, followed by a nine-inning contest Sunday at noon.

Coach Mike Clark has not yet decided on his weekend pitching rotation. Junior Kent Hipp was scheduled to start one of the games, but pitched eight relief innings Thursday in an 8-5 loss to Wichita State. In tonight's Big Eight action, Missouri plays host to Nebraska, Oklahoma travels to Kansas and Iowa State is at Oklahoma State. The six teams will play four-game series through the weekend.

time this season David hasn't gotten us into the eighth inning."

Hipp's performance on the mound — eight innings of one-run baseball - gave the team, and himself, an unexpected boost of sorts.

'When I came out of the bullpen, I figured there wasn't much pressure with us down 7-0," Hipp said. "With Dave on the mound, I sure didn't expect to pitch.

"The split finger was working really well. I felt like I could put it pretty much where ever Dan (catcher Skala) wanted it. We tried to mix things up and he called an excellent game. "Kent hung in there and gave us a chance to get back in the game," Clark said of Hipp. "He did everything we needed, especially throwing strikes." While Hipp kept the Shocks at bay - allowing only a solo homer by Todd Dreifort in the third - his it's not there," Clark said. "What teammates chipped away at the 8-0 Wichita State lead.

K-State third baseman Brad Rippelmeyer tags out Wichita State shortstop Mike Lansing in the second inning of the 8-5 Wichita State win at Frank Myers Field Thursday night. Lansing was trying to steal and was gunned down by Wildcat catcher Dan Skala.

K-State cut the lead in half in the fourth, scoring four runs on five

The big blow in the inning was Chris Hmielewski's two-run homer to the opposite field with no one out. L.J. Twyner added a run-scoring double in the frame for K-State. The inning ended with Brian Culp being picked off first on a fake-to-third, throw-to-first move.

The 'Cats were silent until the seventh, when they broke through against reliever Brian Buzard. After two were out, Culp doubled to left and was singled home by Craig

K-State put together a pair of two-out singles in the ninth against Shocker relief ace Jeff Williams, but Williams retired potential tying run Brad Rippelmeyer with two on and two out to end the game.

The win for Wichita State went to starter Darrin Paxton, 8-2. Williams got his eighth save.

The largest crowd ever to watch a college baseball game in the state of Kansas — 6,155 — filled the bleachers and lined the fences surrounding the playing surface at Frank Myers Thursday night.

Snyder pleased with team's progress, says offensive line, backs stand out

By Scott Paske Sports Reporter

A lack of alumni interest has changed Saturday's spring football finale from a Varsity-Alumni game to a Purple-White intrasquad scrimmage.

K-State coach Bill Snyder said Thursday the Wildcats will participate in a split-squad game, with several players changing jerseys to run plays with various units. Kickoff for the contest, which is open to the public, is slated for 1:10 p.m. at KSU

"A year ago, when I came, they wanted to have an alumni game, and I said 'I do not want to have one," Snyder said. "The reason was I wanted to take advantage of every workouts, I wanted to make sure that advantages to that. we got everything we could conceivably get out of them.

"That meant that we took half of that 20th practice and gave it to the alumni ... But it turned out to be a delightful part of our program and was well worth having, so consequently, I was in favor of it this year."

Like last Saturday's 21/4 -hour scripted practice, this weekend's game will keep 22 varsity players on the field at all times. Snyder said

"It's good in that it gives our guys that many more reps," he said. "The other side of it is that you have to be extremely careful from an injury standpoint, because our numbers are

The scrimmage will also give fans chance to witness three areas Snyder said the 'Cats have strengthened during the spring session - offensive line, running backs and

K-State's primary worries heading into spring were losses of several graduating seniors up front and in the defensive backfield. The 'Cats also averaged just 59.7 yards per game rushing in 1989.

"We've got awfully young kids in the offensive line, and yet, they have responded very, very well," Snyder said. "We have put them in some very compromising situations this spring and have tried to mature them faster than you would most people."

The K-State coach cited the improvement of running backs Pat Jackson, Antoine Dulan, Eric Gallon, Curtis Madden and David Bowman.

"It was important for us to enhance our running game," Snyder said. "One of the most improved areas is the toughness with which our running backs and fullbacks are running the ball. We have to be a more ground-oriented offense in order for our defense to have a chance."

Snyder reported that 12 players would miss Saturday's game.

Schildknecht qualifies for No. 2 singles championship

By Chris Hays Sports Editor

OKLAHOMA CITY - No. 2 singles player Helen Schildknecht remained alive as K-State's lone representative in the winner's bracket after a disappointing first day for Wildcat women at the Big Eight Tennis Championships Thursday. "We were very disappointed," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "What could have gone wrong (Thursday),

The day didn't start well for any of the eight teams that arrived at a rainsoaked Oklahoma City Tennis Center. The teams were sent back to their hotels and told to return at 11:30 a.m. By that time the rain had worsened and the teams were moved indoors to various sites around the city.

By afternoon, however, the teams were called back to the dried-out courts at the Tennis Center. They managed to finish the first day of competition at about 10 p.m., nearly five hours behind schedule.

Schildknecht, who was named the Big Eight tennis player of the week Monday, lived up to her No. 2 seeding by taking care of Nebraska's Ann

Flannery in straight sets, 6-1 and 6-4. Schildknecht will try to advance to the finals when she meets Oklahoma's Bernadette Brennan in one semifinal match today. Top-seeded Sally Godman of Oklahoma State will meet Colorado's Sonja Panajotovic in the other semifinal at No. 2

"That's one of the positive things to come out of (Thursday's matches)," Bietau said of Schildknecht. "She played well. I think she's got a great chance (today), and we'll see what happens."

Schildknecht was hoping for a shot at playing in singles and doubles championship matches, but she and Sara Hancock were upset in the first up, but you never know."

round at No. 1 doubles by Iowa State's Kim Dempsey and Chrisi Hill, 6-4 and 6-4.

Marijke Nel and Valerie Rive provided the only other first-round victory Thursday for the K-State women, defeating the Kansas team of Laura Hagemann and Stacey Stotts at No. 2 doubles, 6-3 and 6-2.

Nel and Rive, however, were ousted in the semifinals by Nebraska's Ildiko Guba and Flannery, 1-6, 6-0 and 6-3. They will pair up today in the third-place No. 2 doubles match against Oklahoma's sister duo of Pam and Debby Ridgley, who defeated Nel and Rive earlier this

"We only advanced two in the first round, and now it's going to be hard," Bietau said of finishing in the upper division. The team's only upper-division finish was last year. "I'd be surprised if we could move

Men's golf team finishes 8th; Cowboys run away with title

By Chris Hays Sports Editor

EDMOND, Okla. - Bad weather and bad luck hampered the K-State men's golf team in the final round of the Big Eight Championships Thursday at Oak Tree Golf and Country Club.

After finishing the first two rounds in last place, just one stroke behind seventh-place Missouri Wednesday, K-State failed to move up and finished the final round in the same spot.

The Wildcat men fought a steady drizzle all morning long Thursday and the result was the squad's worst round of the 54-hole tournament, at 314.

Oklahoma State ran away with the team title, outdistancing second-place Oklahoma by 31 strokes, 849-880. Colorado finished in third at 887, Iowa State was fourth at 909, Kansas was fifth at 911, Nebraska was sixth at 914, Missouri seventh at 919, and K-

State finished eighth at 920. O-State's Kevin Wentworth led the all-conference team by taking medalist honors with a one-overpar 211.

"We can talk about the weather, but then you see what Oklahoma effort."

State was able to shoot," K-State coach Russ Bunker said. "It rained on everybody.

Brett Vuillemin gave the Wildcat men at least something to get excited about, as he fell just one stroke shy of making the eight-man all-tourney team.

Vuillemin, who finished rounds one and two with a third-place, two-over-par 142 Wednesday, fell off the pace a bit during the final 18, shooting a 10-over 81 to drop to ninth place overall at 223.

"I was really happy with Brett Vuillemin for the tourney," Bunker said. "He falls one shot shy of being all-Big Eight ... That's just great for a sophomore, especially when you consider that you have the No. 1 and No. 4 teams in the country here, and four that are in the Top 20. It's a great accomplishment and I'm very proud of the Freshman Richard Laing fought through some very bad luck on the final hole to wind up the tourney with a 226, while Jeff Sedorcek was right behind him at 229, Chris Thompson had a 244 and Brad Stephens had a 255.

It was a very disappointing finish for Bunker and his squad, which had figured on moving out of the Big Eight cellar this season.

After getting three competitive scores from Vuillemin, Laing and Sedorcek Wednesday, the 'Cats could not come up with a good enough fourth and final score in either round.

"We've still got to get our fourth and fifth guys to put some numbers on the board," Bunker said. "We just can't get four good rounds out of five guys.

Of his top five golfers, Bunker will lose only one, Sedorcek, to graduation and said that he is very positive about the way his younger players have played.

"I still think we've got a great base. We're young," Bunker said. "Rich had a great year and Brett's coming on strong.

"In this conference, we can be eighth and not that bad, and that's just where I feel we are.

Anyone taking six semester hours or more is eligible to be hired as a Royal Purple staffer. The staff for the 1991 Royal Purple was hired in March, and all are paid positions, Hilt said. Editor for the 1991 yearbook will be Margo Keller, sophomore in business.

and college journalism. "It's been a super year," Puntney said. "Our copy is stronger than that of recent years, and we have had a tremendous cooperative attitude among the staff. We have made all of our deadlines and even made some of them early."

The yearbook is broken down into different sections, which include student life, sports, academics, housing and organizations.

"The Royal Purple has five deadlines to meet during the year," Hilt said. "The first big one is in October, and that is when all of our color photos must be taken and sent in."

Hilt said that before deadlines, the staff put in as many as 70 hours a week, and the average is from 25 to 50 hours a week.

The University will celebrate May Day Saturday at the campus conservatory.

The celebration will herald the spring season, offering colorful flowers for area residents, Jennings said. The public is also invited to see the rose garden, part of the University's new botanical garden.

Jennings said this is the first time the horticulture department has sponsored May Day activities. He said the department wants to make the event a learning experience for all who attend. "There is tremendous community involvement joining with us for the event and I really feel good about it," he said. The first University conservatory was located by Dickens Hall, Jennings said. It was relocated to the west side of the dairy barn on Denison Avenue when Bluemont Hall was built in 1978.

The conservatory contains living displays of desert cacti, a tropical rain forest with fruit-bearing banana trees and a subtropical garden, Jennings said. A highlight of the garden is an 8 foot tall flower on the agave plant.

"The agave, or century plant, is especially worth seeing because it blooms only once every 75 or 100 years," he said. "The flower stalk has been growing for the past two months and the first of hundreds of small pale yellow buds are starting to open." May Day will also be the first time people can look at the new rose garden, said Ed Bagley, a retired economics professor and rose

Bagley is scheduled to speak Saturday about the selection and spring care of roses. He has been growing roses for more than 40 years and is a member of the American Rose Society and the Topeka Rose Society.

May Day events are scheduled from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m, Jennings said. Activities and displays include a 12-foot Maypole, ice cream sales, public tours of the conservatory and demonstrations on growing.

The familiar love story of the children of the feuding Montague and Capulet families will be performed by Ballet West at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

William Shakespeare's classic tragedy, "Romeo and Juliet" is choreographed by Michael Smuin to the music of composer Sergei Prokofiev.

"Romeo and Juliet' hasn't ever been done at McCain," Richard Martin, director of McCain, said. "This is a chance for the University to see a major production."

Martin said the performance, one of the largest ballets to come to K-State, is nearly sold out. The company, which is from Salt Lake City, will include about 40 dancers. "In programming we try to provide a good sampling of the arts," Martin said. "Ballet West was doing a work that ought to be seen here.

"This is a story that nearly everyone knows. The production seemed incredibly appropriate. This is just exactly what we needed."

In a story ballet, it is hard to communicate emotions through dance. The choreographer selects the elements of the plot that can be told through dance, Martin said, and Smuin tries to demonstrate these feelings through the solo scenes.

"The main character traits revealed in the play come across," Martin said. "Realize, Smuin isn't trying to retell the story. He has his own purpose for telling the story in dance."

Martin said the company's performances of "Romeo and Juliet" in Aspen, Colo., and Detroit received incredible reviews.

Ballet West includes an extensive light show in its production of "Ro-

Jeff Priddle, a member of the light crew and senior in architectural engineering, said the light crew will probably work from 7:30 Saturday morning to 2:30 Sunday morning.

"Their light show is more than anything we've done all year," he said. "We will be really pushing the theater to the limit to get all the lights in here.'

The ballct features a sword fight between characters Tybalt, Mercutio and Romeo.

This is one of the most realistic fight scenes in contemporary ballet," Martin said.

According to information released by Ballet West's managers, Smuin's "Romeo and Juliet" was first performed by the San Francisco Ballet in 1976. Ballet West presented its premiere performance in Salt Lake City in September 1988.

"This is an incredibly large show," Martin said. "A lot of work goes on to create the illusion of simplicity.

"This is a first-rate company. There is no doubt about it.'

Prime Minister chosen to form government

By The Associated Press

JERUSALEM - Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, leader of the rightwing Likud bloc, was chosen Thursday to try to form a new government after the Labor Party leader failed in his attempt to forge what he called a peace coalition.

A Shamir-led government could spell trouble for U.S. efforts to arrange a Palestinian-Israeli dialogue, but Shamir could face as daunting a challenge as Labor's Shimon Peres did in finding coalition partners.

Peres predicted Shamir would also fail to form a coalition in the deadlocked parliament. But he said that if Shamir succeeded, he would create an extremist right-wing government the like of which Israel never had.

Peres called President Chaim Herzog on Thursday and announced he was unable to break a 60-60 standoff in Israel's 120-seat Knesset, or parliament.

Herzog's office said the president would give the job to Shamir, head of the caretaker government that took over after parliament voted March 15 to end the Labor-Likud coalition.

Shamir, 74, will get the mandate in a ceremony Friday morning at the president's residence. A spokesman said he would accept.

The Polish-born Shamir, who lost his parents and two sisters in the Nazi Holocaust, was a pre-state radical underground leader who later served as a senior official in Israel's Mossad intelligence agency.

Shamir has rejected any dealings with Yasser Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization and has forged ahead with settlement building in Israeli-occupied lands, despite increasing signs of strain with Washington.

In recent weeks, for example, Shamir's government approved settlements in the occupied Gaza Strip and the West Bank. It was also revealed that it secretly gave $1.8 million to a Jewish settlement in the Christian quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem.

The new settlement activity sparked sharp protests from the U.S. State Department, which considers settlements in the occupied territories an obstacle to peace.

In Washington, State Department deputy spokesman Richard Boucher said the United States was dismayed by reports of new settlements at Dugit in the Gaza Strip and Alon in the West Bank.

"It is disturbing that the caretaker government is taking steps that the National Unity government was unwilling to take on settlements," Boucher said. "It is our longstanding position that settlement activity in the occupied territories is an obstacle to the achievement of a just and lasting peace."

Woodyard said the computer printouts and the material stored by the computer is in a computer room that only the department's computer manager has access to.

Police records showed the call reporting the fire was made by Eric Larson, freshman in environmental design, who lives at 1016

Gardenway. Jared Akers, freshman in electrical engineering, said he and Larson were driving by when they saw smoke. He said Larson dropped him off at the scene while Larson went to call the

"Someone called the same time I did," Larson said. "I could hear them (the other caller) talking in the background."

But he said he knew of no one who had called before him.

According to police records, police dispatcher Elke Weese took the call from Larson. Weese said she was instructed not comment by her superior officer, Lt. Scott Campbell.

"I called in," Cunningham said. "I didn't run outside and then come back in. I called right when I got up."

Woodyard said the call may have been transferred to another area, but the possiblity of it getting misdirected was slight, and he did not know of any previous instance where that has happened.

Cunningham said he would expect some kind of investigation from the fire and RCPD to prove he reported

"Someone misplaced my call," he said. "It's as if my call didn't even Woodyard said it is important to determine if the call was mishandled in order to ease Cunningham's mind and to discover if an error occurred and what it was.

"If he's adamant he did and called 911, we need to know that if there's a fluke in the system or equipment," Woodyard said. "The whole 911 system is designed for rapid contact and rapid response in emergency conditions. If it's not working, we need to Budget

"I'd much rather see students here in Topeka than staging a protest at the University," she said. "The whole art is to communicate, and usually demonstrators are regarded as not being able to communicate."

Oleen said although the enrollment adjustment funding hasn't been added, the current budget proposal gives K-State $8 million more dollars than previously.

"K-State will survive. There will have to be some shifting (of funds), but we have to look at both sides of the story.'

"Last year, we gave multiple sclerosis $2,500, and this year's goal is to give them $3,500," Eilert said. 'We've raised the entry fee and cut down expenses."

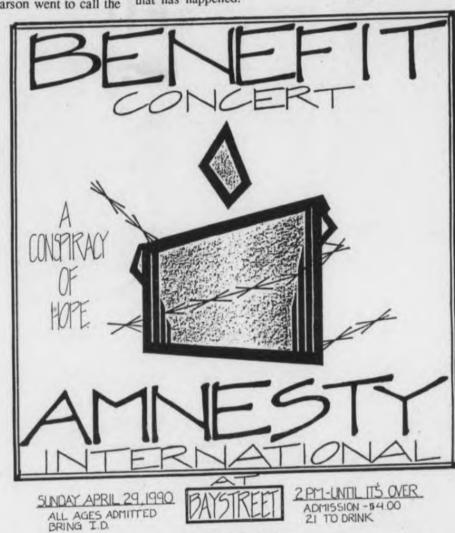

"We are having the race professionally timed, unlike last year," said E.J. Schwartz, sophomore in premedicine.

Participants can enter up until shortly before the race in individual or relay team categories. However, to insure an entry spot, early registration is encouraged.

The race categories are broken into men's and women's individual age groups, along with men's relay, women's relay and mixed relay divisions.

Awards will be given to the top three men, women and relay teams in each division.

Anti-abortion group sponsors rally

Candlelight walk conducted to improve area awareness

By Tim Clopton Collegian Reporter

The Manhattan chapter of Kansans for Life, an anti-abortion organization, met for a rally Saturday at City Park.

Dan Walter, textbook manager of Varney's who has given several speeches on the anti-abortion topic, and Kent Hampton, president of the chapter, spoke to about 60 people who attended the rally. The speeches were followed by a candlelight march around the perimeter of the

"This is an opportunity for prolifers to encourage each other," said Catie Shinn, spiritual director of the chapter. "There is a rally being held in Washington, and we are meeting here because we can't be there."

Shinn said the candlelight walk was organized to increase community awareness of the group.

Walters talked about "the three commitments pro-lifers must make if they want to be effective in the '90s." He said abortion opponents must be committed to anti-abortion education, political involvement and to loving the children.

"In the book of Psalms, God says that children are a gift," he said. "But we who hold to a Judeo-Christian ethic have often rejected that particular teaching. Children are a priceless Walters said tasteful and accurate education tools are the best way to reach the public.

"People are very negative about shocking presentations," he said. "But for someone trying to make a responsible decision, there needs to be pro-life material available for

K-State racism

By Tomari Quinn

and Julie Andsager

Features Editor Race relations became the focus of attention on two university campuses in Kansas the past month. An African-American student at the University of Kansas was the alleged victim of a racial slur March 30 while delivering pizzas to a fraternity. The incident touched off a sit-in and led to the establishment of a new race relations policy at KU. Less than a week later, remarks involving the words "these people" at a Student Senate meeting sparked a debate about attitudes toward minorities at K-State. The student senators insisted their words had nothing to do with race, but members of Black Student Union pointed out that minorities are sensitive to such terminology.

Student Governing Association

People who are not part of a minority group do not have the background to understand what may or may not be offensive, said Thomas Mackey, assistant professor of history. Mackey specializes in African-American history.

Care in the use of language is important when interacting with the members of a minority group, Mackey said.

"To be referred to as one of 'these people' is going to strike home," he said. "It is going to strike nerves." While students who are not part of a minority group may consider only racial slurs and open prejudice discriminatory, the wording of "these people" shows how attitudes toward minorities can be conveyed in more subtle ways, said the Rev. Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities at K-State.

"I think I can describe it best through the word intolerance," Fallon said. "There is a sense of not so much open discrimination (at K-

Analysis

The allocations process began with Finance Committee hearings in February. The committee made recommendations to Senate on what groups should be allocated money and in what categories it should be spent. Senate then tentatively allocated the money based on enrollment projections for the coming year.

The tentative allocations approved by Senate will not become final until fall, when the fees are actually collected. After an official total can be calculated, the final allocations are approved. Until then, a group can only spend 25 percent of its tentative allocation.

The $225,673.50 tentatively allocated is $4,808.24 more than enrollment projections predicted would be received in fee monies this fall, Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, said this deficit should not cause a problem because the enrollment projections were conservative.

"We didn't add in an enrollment increase," Routson said. 'We're graduating a small senior class and bringing in a bigger freshman class.' If increased enrollment doesn't make up the difference, Senate can cover the deficit out of its reserve accounts or from unspent money returned by groups at the end of this fiscal year, Routson

The major reason for the deficit was Senate's decision to fund UFM, despite objections from the Finance Committee. The committee decided not to fund UFM and budgeted the money elsewhere. Senate reversed this decision and gave UFM the $13,783.70 they requested. Senate did not cut funds from other groups to make up the difference, however, and used money set aside for reserves instead. The total amount of special fees to be paid by full-time students beyond 1990-91 tuition is $167.60. Of this, most are lineitem fees that are periodically reviewed by Senate or fixed fees that go to pay off bond issues. The largest of these fees is the $75 Student Health Fee, which goes to fund Lafene Student Health Center. Although tuition rates differ, all full-time students pay the same amount in special fees. Part-time students pay $25.03 less than full-time students due to special part-time rates on certain fees.

Soviet Union eases blockade

MOSCOW (AP) - The Soviet Union unexpectedly eased part of its economic blockade against Lithuania, almost doubling the amount of natural gas flowing into the Baltic republic, Lithuania said Sunday.

Residents of the republic, which declared its independence March 11, organized a bicycle rally to show their defiance of the Kremlin's decision to shut off oil supplies. The republic's television and radio stations also planned to play Beethoven's Ninth Symphony as a symbol of hope and freedom.

Announcement of the sudden easing of the gas restriction came after both President Vytautas Landsbergis of Lithuanian and a spokesman for President Mikhail Gorbachev praised a proposed compromise to their dispute offered by France and West Germany. The two Western countries proposed Lithuania delay implementing its independence without rescinding the declaration itself.

Jews to meet in Germany

WEST BERLIN (AP) - The World Jewish Congress will hold its first conference in Germany next week, ending with a ceremony at Wannsee, the villa where Nazis planned the extermination of European Jews half a century ago.

Mass killing of Jews had begun when Reinhard Heydrich and his companions convened in January 1942, at the elegant villa on a lake in southwestern Berlin, to work out details of the Final Solution.

On May 8, World Jewish Congress delegates from around the world will gather at Wannsee to join their sorrow for the 6 million Jewish victims to present-day concerns.

Police, striking workers clash

ULSAN, South Korea (AP) - Thousands of workers and students fought running street battles with riot police Sunday, and a dissident labor group called for sympathy strikes to protest a police raid on a strike-bound shipyard.

In Seoul and elsewhere, radical students staged violent street demonstrations in protest against the raid Saturday that crushed a three-day strike at the world's largest shipyard, the Hyundai Heavy Industries Co. complex in this port city 200 miles southeast of Seoul.

Police reported some injuries and arrests but gave no overall figures.

In Ulsan, scattered street fighting continued amid a dense fog of tear gas near the shipyard throughout Sunday as about 3,000 workers staged running battles with riot police.

Groups of up to 200 workers attacked police with firebombs, rocks and other projectiles after grouping in alleyways near the shipyard. Some workers used slingshots to shoot rocks at the police, who retaliated with tear gas.

"Down with (President) Roh Tae-woo!" workers shouted as they raised clenched fists into the air.

Discovery lands safely

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. (AP) - Discovery glided safely back to Earth on Sunday, landing with new brakes after launching the $1.5 billion Hubble Space Telescope to search for clues to the universe's creation.

NASA engineers in Maryland, meanwhile, tried to figure out how to restore full movement to one of the telescope's two dish-shaped, high-speed antennas. They believe the antenna was caught behind a cable that bent outward from its proper position before Discovery was launched, spokesman Mike Harrington said.

Marijuana rally draws 1,300

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — A rally to support the legalization of marijuana Sunday drew about 1,300 people who heard speeches praising the environmental benefits of the plant and bought shirts made partly from marijuana plants.

Author and activist Jack Herer told the crowd marijuana is good for people and for the planet.

"You can have a good high, expand your mind, live longer and save the planet, all by going absolutely against what the government tells you to do," he said.

A few onlookers quietly disagreed. "That little green plant is a symbol for death, and the kids are buying it," said Jane Govern, a Kansas City resident. Govern said she came partly because one of her childhood friends, a St. Louis police officer, recently was killed by drug dealers.

Herer told the crowd that marijuana, also known as hemp, is cleaner and cheaper than trees for making paper. It also makes a more durable fabric than cotton, he said, and requires no chemicals to help it grow.

Rally organizers were selling shirts made with 55 percent hemp and 45 percent cotton, which looked and felt similar to

The rally began at the J.C Nichols Fountain and wound up at Theis Mall. About 200 people carried signs reading "Free Herb" and "Legal and Taxed."

Woman killed outside store

KANSAS CITY, Kan. (AP) - Investigators had no leads Sunday in the murder of a teen-age mother who was shot to death as she waited for her boyfriend in a grocery store park-

Sara Foulk, 17, was shot to death and her 4-month-old son briefly abducted as they waited outside the store early Saturday, said Don Ash, spokesman for the Kansas City, Kan., police

'At this point, unless someone calls, we're out of clearly followable leads," Ash said.

The Metro Squad was to begin investigating the killing Monday morning, Ash said. Foulk was sitting in the car outside the store waiting for the baby's father, Sean Malloy, who had stopped to buy milk and cigarettes, police said. When Malloy came out of the store, he found Foulk shot to death on the pavement and the car and baby gone. Foulk was pronounced dead at Bethany Medical Center. The baby was found uninjured about 30 minutes later on the porch of an abandoned house, and the car was recovered about 4 a.m., police said. Police briefly questioned three men early Saturday but released them without charges.

Student arrested Saturday

A student was arrested Saturday morning for the alleged rape of another K-State student.

Ramon Davenport, junior in sociology, was arrested at Moore Hall at about 2:30 a.m. Saturday, according to K-State Police reports.

The victim, who was discovered by her roommate, was taken to The Saint Mary Hospital, according to the report.

Davenport, a defensive end for the K-State Wildcat football team, was released from the Riley County Jail at 3:20 p.m. Saturday on $1,000 bond.

Crews from emergency services across the state and the Midwest work to move a rescue boat to a victim during a simulation rescue. The exercise was part of the Riley County Emergency Medical Service Water Rescue Class at Rocky Ford Fishing Area Saturday and Sunday.

Water rescue class offered

By Tim Clopton

Many people do not realize how often water-related accidents occur in the area, said Keith Brown, technical rescue unit coordinator for the Riley County Emergency Medical Service.

"We lose a lot of fishermen off the dam," Brown said. "500 cubic feet of water doesn't look that dangerous, but it will suck you down fast."

The Riley County Emergency Medical Service sponsored a water rescue class this weekend at the Rocky Ford fishing area. The course was taught by Dive Rescue International, a professional rescue team based in Colorado.

Brown said about 30 people from four states, including members of the Riley County Dive Rescue Team, attended the course.

The water rescue class is the fourth in a series of five classes that help prepare the rescue team for emergencies in the Riley County area, Brown said.

The three-day course began Friday with classroom instruction on hydraulics and moving water. Examples of successful and unsuccessful rescues were shown on video tape during the first day, said Eric Ward, mobile intensive care techni-

"One of the biggest problems that you see is sending people into a situation when it's hopeless from the start," Ward said. "If you send someone into the water to try to pull out someone who is already dead, then you take a chance of losing the rescuer too."

Ward said learning proper rescue procedures and how to use the equipment helps reduce the chances of of similar unsuccessful rescues.

On Saturday and Sunday, the students practiced several techniques for manuevering in the rapid water. Brown said the water level was about two feet below normal which made some of the procedures harder "The techniques and lessons are the same, but with it being shallow, it makes it a little more difficult for the student," he said. To manuever in the rapid water, students layed on boogie boards, small surf board-shaped flotation devices, to help them glide while paddling to a certain point. "With a boogie board, a wet suit and a personal flotation system you can go anywhere in moving water," Ward said.

The students used a four-line system, to move a 16-foot inflatable raft in the water, Brown said.

University reports 10 harassment cases

Most incidents called unintentional, involving jokes, comments, posters

By Jan Puls Collegian Reporter

Sexual harassment is illegal, a form of discrimination and a problem at K-State.

Between Oct. 1, 1987, and Sept. 30, 1988, 10 confirmed cases of sexual harassment were handled by the Office of Affirmitive Action, according to an annual discrimination report published by the office.

Six of the cases involved students harassed by faculty. Three cases involved faculty or supervisors. The last case involved a student harassed by a student supervisor.

where, and is not limited to K-State," said

Jane Rowlett, director of the Office of Affimative Action.

The University policy prohibiting sexual harassment defines it as "any behavior which, through inappropriate sexual content or disparagement of members of one sex, interferes with an individual's work or learning environment."

Until a few years ago, sexual harassment wasn't considered a form of discrimination and was regarded as a personal problem of members harassed by other faculty members the victim, Rowlett said. But the courts eventually established that employers are responsible for providing a workplace free of Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which interpret Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, "employers are responsible for the acts of its employees with respect to sexual harassment, whether the employer knows, or should have known, of the conduct.'

In 1983, the University adopted the Policy Prohibiting Sexual Harassment. Along with this policy came a campaign to educate supervisors and employees about sexual harassment, Rowlett said.

Publishing the confirmed harassment cases is a way of showing the public the University really does something about harassment, Rowlett said. The report is published a year later to protect the identity of the people involved.

"Most of the people who have a problem with harassment are women," Rowlett said. "It becomes an element of position as women have many women faculty members or supervisors.

'The women that come in are very serious about what is happening. They see reporting the incident as a last resort. They have taken their lives into their own hands, so to speak."

Most of the confirmed harassment cases handled by the Affirmative Action Office are unintentional, she said. The respondent usually agrees the incident occurred.

Harassment many times occurs in the form of jokes or comments about a woman's anatomy, she said. Offensive posters, persistent date invitations and recurring comments about how pretty a woman is can also be considered harassment.

"Usually the respondents don't mean for their actions to be harmful," Rowlett said. "They thought it would be funny or flattering. When they found out what effect their behavior had, they were very sorry."

said. Women employees are afraid they will lose their jobs and think they may not be taken seriously. Students don't report their instructors for harassment because they are afraid they will lose a valuable reference or fail the class.

Instead of reporting incidents of harass-ment, students skip classes, Rowlett said. Employees either quit their jobs or take a demotion to escape the harassing employer or supervisor. The main effect of harassment is decreased productivity.

"Victims should come in," Rowlett said. "This University doesn't condone that type of behavior and we have an effective review process.

According to the University's policy, students or faculty members should report cases of harassment to the University administrator responsible for the department in which the incident occurred or to the Office of Affirma-

German reunification not cause for alarm

coming more and more agitated. That is the date that East and Vest Germany will socially and economically unite. The union is a big step toward the ultimate goal of complete unification. Some closed-minded individuals are afraid the union will give "the German" the power he needs to start up the old "Deutschland Uber Alles Machine.

Wrong.

After such a long time apart, unification is a wonderful, momentous occasion for Germans and the rest of the world. Families will again be free to visit each other. East Germans will be able to see the world - in addition to leaving the country, they will have real money to spend. And they will not have to wait seven or more years to obtain products. Beautiful East German cities will be accessible to all Westerners. Statues, historical sites and great architecture abound, previously unknowable by anyone but East Germans.

When governmental unification finally arrives, it seems more than likely that East Germans will enjoy the same human rights as West Germans — nearly the same rights Americans hold sacred. These events are indicative of progress toward world peace and s July 2 nears, some people are be- man's innate desire to conquer the world." They apparently think German people have always been, and will always be, hell-bent to rule the Earth and the only reason they haven't is that we had the good sense to separate them after World War II. That view is so incredibly stupid, it's, it's ... incredible.

Unfortunately, however, some feel a single, large Germany will nurture "the Ger-

It is insane to assume the drive to reunify Germany is fueled by a Hitlerian dream of conquering the world. A unified Germany has nothing whatsoever to do with Hitler, Nazis, religious or racial holocaust, or even the risk of a World War III.

Germans are humans, and are no more desirous of ruling the world than anyone else. The United States is itself guilty of assuming the position of "Police of the World." The United States has frequently started squabbles and escalated battles into wars, if not to actually gain land, then to impose democracy at any cost. Look at the Vietnam conflict. Imposing our ideals on other people is basically trying to conquer the world without actually doing so. Still, we do not regard ourselves as instinctively trying to rule the world.

England actually became a world power through wars and annexation of land. England had colonies all over the world - Africa, Canada, Australia. America was colonized in the effort to gain more land, and they fought us when we decided we wanted our own country. Yet we don't feel the English citizen has an innate desire to conquer the

We can't blame a country's people for having a desire to be a world power. And if they can do it, more power to them, so to speak. While Germany will be in the position to become a world economic power, its people have no desire to rule the world. Besides, the European Economic Community will probably make Europe a world power, not any single country. As for "the German's" ruthless capitalistic export efficiency and love of money in disregard for the welfare of the world - bah. A citizen of the United States who shames Germany for its methods of capitalism has got to be a communist. The United States is built on capitalism and is notorious for allowing the export of questionable products. The American big business policy is: if the product is the United States, sell it to a country that was still feeling the effects of Otto von Bisdoesn't know better.

ome are afraid that Germany will "do it again" - start another major war. It is a fact that both world wars more or less began with Germany. But each war was started for a different reason, and both had to do with the government's leaders and policies at that time - conditions that do not exist today. The assumption that these wars are indicative of "the German being" arises from a misunderstanding of the events and conditions preceding the wars.

World War I escalated out of a local squabble in the Baltic States. While Germany took the major responsibility for letting the thing ally doing, the Nazi horrors were in full get out of hand, according to Koppel S. Pinson's "Modern Germany: Its History and Civilization," other factors contributed to the outbreak of World War I. "There were Deroulede's chauvinist followers in France, thwarted by the Gestapo and the S.S. ruthless imperialists in England, and saberrattling militarists in the United States."

Prior to World War I, Germany's Kaiser William II indeed followed a course of action and foreign policy designed to secure colonies and land to make Germany a world power. This was fueled by a strong feeling of German nationalism that had existed among their country's past actions. That so, the its citizens. But the nationalism came from, world has nothing to lose and everything to among other things, the fact Germany was at gain from a unified Germany.

unsafe, unapproved or banned from sale in the tail end of its industrial revolution and marck's leadership.

After World War I, the economic collapse of 1929 left Germany in economic shambles. People were out of work, poor and starving. They needed someone to save them. Hitler promised - and gave - the recovery that Germany needed. He created jobs, put food on tables and pulled Germany out of its hole. Hitler seemed to Germans and the world like a regular guy.

And then he turned bad.

World War II arose from one insane man's desire to conquer the world. By the time German citizens realized what Hitler was actuswing. Almost all Germans disagreed with Adolf Hitler's dream and methodology, but were completely powerless to do anything about it. Any attempts to stop Hitler were

That was then - different generations, different conditions, different leaders. And this is now. Current Germany is not under the influence of the economic situations and leaders that preceded World War I and II.

Germans are simply people. It is not logical or fair to define the Germans of today by

Library needs attention

he students of K-State have a prob-lem. Farrell Library is unhealthy, unsafe and obsolete. The present structure is the result of three separate construction periods. According to Lawrence Garvin, director of the facilities planning office, the original building dates back to 1927 and consists of approximately 61,000 square feet. Most of this area is not able to be used for book storage due to floor loading capacity restrictions. The next construction was performed in 1955 with an addition of approximately 36,500 square feet. There is no air conditioning in these two areas. David Frese reported in the March 22 Collegian that Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock told former Gov. John Carlin, "It gets up in the 90 to 100 degree range and it just fries the books." Well, it also fries the students who need to use the

The third, and latest, construction on the library was in 1970, consisting of approximately 110,500 square feet. Hobrock commented " ... It was intended that there would be a second phase completed by 1983, ... The planners knew that this section would be full by 1983, but somebody dropped the ball." The loss of the second phase is a major part of the problem as it exists today. About 200,000 volumes were moved from the library to Nichols Hall last year with current plans to move about 170,000 more to the old Farm Bureau building. These moves place almost one third of Farrell's total volumes effectively out of circulation. Hobrock also told Carlin, "There are some really dirty parts of this building that I think are really hazardous, fire traps and places that students never see.'

In Regent Charles Hostetler's speech at the library sit-in, the fact was brought up that the University of Kansas' library acquisitions budget is $10.4 million per year while K-State's is only $6.4 million. In other words, for every student, KU spends approximately $450 on its library while K-State spends only approximately $336.

Fifteen years ago, the administration of this University did not hire professional consultants to determine whether we should remodel Ahearn Field House or build a new coliseum. The result is that we have a large bill to pay for what Regent Hostetler called the "Brain-dead Coliseum" during his speech at the library - we don't need a "Brain-dead

How do the planners know that $20 million will be enough for the current proposal, which requires removal and rebuilding of the floors in the oldest section, repair and remodeling of the rest of the old structure and another addition to the library? From what I read about the coliseum fiasco, somebody told the regents and the legislature a 16,000-seat coliseum could be built for $20 million, yet this amount only provided 13,500 seats. The plans call for about 70,000-square feet to be added. However, this is only half of the space needed to meet Board of Regents standards. This addition is planned to be built over the present entrance/ fountain area and extend over the top of Denison Hall. I have three important questions if

1. Where are the books going to be put while the floors are torn out and rebuilt? 2. Will the students have access to library materials needed for classes during the period of construction?

this is what happens:

3. How long are the students going to have to be without any library services while this construction occurs?

When I asked about a new library, it was pointed out that the Board of Regents policy is to repair, remodel or rebuild before building new. I feel that Farrell Library is beyond the three-R stage.

Where would you put a new library and what to do with the old structure, you ask? Those are good questions. One possible site, which has plenty of nearby parking, has no present structures or trees on it and has over 40,000 square feet of fairly level ground, is the field between Memorial Stadium, Ander- Thomas E. The rest of the present structure could be used by the many departments, especially art and theater, that need more space than they currently have. et's have a study to determine whether we should remodel and add to Farrell Library, or do we need to build a new facility, as well as determine how much space we need. If the design stage isn't

When the library is completed, display the original drawings there. I realize that state budgeting guidelines take two years to go into effect, but we need help. By involving enough legislators, we might get an emergency allocation to get this started now instead of in six years. Because K-State is a federal land-grant institution, we might be able to get a federal grant. It is time that we put our foot down and raised our voices. We, the students need to write letters to Student Senate, to editors of various newspapers as well as various representatives and senators concerning these

KSU Stadium alcohol policy a positive step

If the recently proposed KSU Stadium alcohol consumption policy is enacted, the days of clandestine tailgate parties will be over.

The proposed alcohol policy would set aside a section of the stadium parking lot for people who games.

Implementation of this policy would end the ridiculous hypocrisy of the "illegal" tailgating that has been going on for years. A special section reserved for alcohol consumption would aid law enforcement officials in policing drunken drivers, disorderly fans and underage drinkers.

As long as we are rewriting archaic alcohol laws, we might as well consider making K-State a wet campus. Presently, there are only a handful of rooms on campus in which the consumption of alcohol is allowed. These rooms are, want to consume alcohol before not surprisingly, rooms frequented by faculty and alumni.

> As long as the administration is bending over backward, or considering bending over backward, to accommodate the alcoholic needs of faculty and alumni, it only stands to reason that students of legal age should enjoy the same privileges.

BSU Stomp Down draws 300

Fund-raising event showcases rhythm, dance routines without music

By Ellen Dayton Campus Editor

Members of eight Big Eight black greek organizations participated in the Black Student Union Stomp Down '90 Saturday.

About 300 people attend the step contest, a BSU fund-raiser, at the University Inn.

Step routines combine rhythm, dance, choreographed hand movements and chants. The routines are usually performed without music. Some black fraternities have a distinctive step which they use to build a whole routine.

"With us, we try to incorporate dancing skill, step skills, and choreographed hand movements with rhythm," said Larry Fennell, senior

Sigma. "We plan it out. Once we get the rhythm down, we put the hands, feet and words into the step."

In the chants, members "show off" their fraternities or sororities by describing their superiority to other fraternities or sororities.

"We strive to pump up our fraternity and say it's the best," Fennell said. "You have to be proud of your fraternity. If you're not proud of it, you won't uphold it."

The teams of two to seven members were judged by non-greek members of BSU, including Aireka Key, president of BSU, and Theresa Canty, president-elect of BSU.

The judges criteria included orginality, enthusiasm and crowd reac-at WSU and member of Phi Beta tion, said Anita Shelton, coordinator of the Stomp Down and BSU secretary.

The K-State chapter of Delta Sigma Theta won first place in the sorority competition.

"We practiced very hard," said Wanda Baker, Delta Sigma Theta member and senior in history education. "We probably practiced 10 times, about two or three hours each time, over the past two weeks."

A portion of the sorority's routine was centered around the theme "Express Yourself."

"Taking from our roots of dance and expression, we are able to express ourselves," one member said during the routine. "It may be in the way we walk. It may be in the way we talk. It may be in the way we step."

The WSU chapter of Phi Beta Sigma won first place in the fraternity competition. Fennell said the fraternity had entered four competitions this year, and this was the third time it had won.

In their routine, the Phi Beta Sigmas imitated the steps of other fraternities. Chanting "Your step is not impossible. Your step is so easy," they mimicked the steps of Alpha Kappa Alpha, Kappa Alpha Psi and Omega Fennell said it was not difficult to learn the steps of the other fraternities.

"Basically, all you have to do is watch and listen," he said.

'Dead Fishes' capture Oozeball tourney

Volleyball teams proved they could play in sun, wind and mud during the Student Foundation Oozeball Mud Volleyball Tournament last weekend.

"More than 280 students participated this year," said Glennis Carlson, adviser of the Student Foundation and director of administratvie services for the KSU Foudation.

According to the "Ooozeball Rules," teams consisting of four men and four women each played three seven-minute games. The best two out three games determined the winner of a match in the doubleelimination tournament.

This year, a team called the "Dead Fishes" won the first place trophy. The top four teams received "Final Four" shirts.

"We hired a trenching company to dig out the pits," she said.

The pits were finished by members of Student Foundation and filled with water Friday night, she said.

The Oozeball tournament is a fund-raiser for Student Foundation, which uses the money from entry fees and donations from local merchants to fund scholarships and other Student Foundation activities.

"We try to obtain sponsors for two Oozeball scholarships awarded to participating team members," Carlson said.

The scholarships of $250 each are awarded to one male student and one female student later in the year.

Carlson said the seventh annual tournament, like the others, was successful because of the students.

"Every once in awhile, an adviser gets dumped in the pits," Carlson said. "I have been (dumped) twice in one day. They are lucky they have an adviser with a great sense of humor."

The team members of "Dirt Flirts" won three matches. The group was made up of residents of the fourth floor of Goodnow Hall.

Schildknecht nabs No. 2 singles title

Brian W. Kratzer/Staff

Sara Hancock teamed with No. 1 doubles partner Helen Schildknecht to recover from two early round defeats and capture seventh place in their doubles competition Friday at the Big Eight Tennis Championships at Oklahoma City. K-State took third place in the team standings, tying Colorado at 68 points.

By Chris Hays Sports Editor

OKLAHOMA CITY - Switzerland native Helen Schildknecht became the first-ever tennis player from K-State to win a Big Eight tennis title with her victory over Oklahoma State's Sally Godman at No. 2 singles Friday night at the Woodlakes Racquet Club.

Schildknecht's victory highlighted K-State's fifth-place tie with Colorado, 68-68. Oklahoma State, despite Godman's loss in the finals, cruised to the team title for the eighth consecutive year, outdistancing second-place Oklahoma, 130-92. Nebraska was third at 86, and Kansas was fourth at 81.

The scoring is based on individual match victories during the conference regular season and those points are added to the total match victories in the tourney.

K-State entered the Big Eight Championships tied for third place with KU at 33 points, but the Wildcat women did not play as well as expected at some spots, and they eventually dropped in the standings.

Schildknecht's victory, though, may have lessened the blow of finishing in the lower portion of the conference.

"I guess it was a little bit of a highlight," Schildknecht said. "It's not as bad now. We were kind of depressed, but now we have a Big Eight title."

Schildknecht's victory in the semifinals against Oklahoma's Bernadette Brennan was the confidence booster she needed as she entered the finals against the No. 1-seeded Godman. Godman had defeated Schildknecht earlier this year, but Brennan had downed Godman a week prior to the tourney.

"Helen survived some really tough situations in that match," K-State coach Steve Bietau said of the semifinal contest. "Brennan had beaten Godman last week, and I think the idea of that indirect win gave Helen some more confidence. She figured, If Brennan can do it, I can do it."

Schildknecht began her championship match by winning the first two games, and then she held off a Godman rally to win the first set 7-6.

Godman took the next set 5-7, but then Schildknecht fought back to win the third and final set, 7-6, to take the

Why the blind optimism? Why the gun with blanks rather than bullets to shoot at manager John Wathan?

It's simple, really. Thus far, the Royals haven't had a chance to display the entire arsenal they built up during the offseason. was an unimpressive 4-4. Well, they did for one game, but that Things only got worse. Of the next wasn't quite enough. In the season-opening loss to Baltimore, all Wathan's horses and all Wathan's men were in place, and the team played an exciting, extra-inning contest with the Birds. The offense clicked and the pitching was sound - all that was lacking was a bit of skill by Wathan in handling his million-dollar bullpen.

But the offense was soon to be dealt a severe blow. Danny Tartabull, who Wathan had inserted into the No. 5 spot in the batting order behind

During the trip, Jackson and Jim Eisenreich, last season's Royals Player of the Year, were summoned to their respective off-season homes to deal with family illnesses.

Three major cogs in the offensive attack were gone, and with Frank White still bothered by a nagging knee problem and George Brett off to his typical slow start, the club was in

I'm sorry, but a lineup with Pat Tabler, Gary Thurman and Steve Jeltz in it rather than Jackson, Eisenreich and White isn't going to strike fear into the hearts of many pitching staffs. And now White's on the 15-day disabled list to boot.

But take heart. During the stretch of games on the road, a consistent run producer in seasons past — Willie Wilson - displayed a return to the form that enabled him to become one of the league's most feared players in the mid '80s.

Wilson was hitting balls into the gap, stealing bases, diving and making spectacular catches. Simply put, Willie was doing it all.

The team came home for this ninegame run, promptly blew a lead and lost Friday as Davis squandered K.C.'s chances late.

When all the offensive parts come back together, the Royals could have one of the league's most potent attacks. No, there is no consistent longball threat. But there is punch.

Newcomer Gerald Perry, Kevin Seitzer, Brett, Jackson, Tartabull, Eisenreich or Wilson, Kurt Stillwell, White and Bob Boone give K.C. its most legitimate top-to-bottom batting order in years.

And the pitching staff should come around as well. Mark Gubicza's shoulder problems and Bret Saberhagen's popping elbow don't appear as if they'll make a difference. Give these two run support, and they'll win.

Tom Gordon is making 1989 look as if it was a legitimate measure of his ability, not a fluke. And between Storm Davis, Richard Dotson, Larry

A visit by non-conference foe Northern Colorado to Frank Myers Field was just what the doctor ordered for the K-State baseball team this past weekend.

After being beaten by Iowa State in three of four games a weekend earlier, and having been downed by Wichita State Thursday night, the Wildcats entered the weekend looking for some answers.

And they got nearly all of them in a three-game sweep over the Bears. "We got accomplished what we

'Cats rack up big totals

Sports Reporter

Most coaches will tell you the scoreboard is usually the last thing that matters in a spring football game, but it was hard not to notice the one at KSU Stadium Saturday.

Purple 75 - that's right, 75 -White 10.

Not even the Oklahoma Sooners of 1969, who felt the wrath of Wildcat greats Lynn Dickey and Mack Herron in a 59-21 rout, were exposed to such an offensive juggernaut as the White defense was this weekend.

Unfortunately, that unit was the 'Cats' second-team defense.

"I think that's a tribute to our lack of depth as much as anything," Coach Bill Snyder said. "That can create a problem as far as a lack of confidence."

If confidence was a factor, the 'Cat offense fed its ego repeatedly in the intrasquad scrimmage. On the game's second play, senior quarterback Carl Straw delivered a 77-yard strike to Michael Smith for the first of four touchdowns for the junior all-Big Eight receiver. The duo connected on a 39-yarder four minutes later to make the score 14-0.

Then it was the Purple running backs' turn.

Senior Patrick Jackson, who rushed for 163 yards on 16 carries, scored from three yards midway through the first quarter. Backfield mate Eric Gallon, who netted 152 yards on 12 attempts, added the final touchdown of the opening stanza on a 12-yard run. "Our offense went in there with the attitude that we were going to score on every play," Gallon said. With the scoreboard posting larger numbers every 41/2 -minutes, Gallon's statement almost seemed true. Gallon and Jackson added their second touchdowns of the game on a 15-yard pass reception and threeyard run, respectively, in between scoring drives by the Whites. Junior Paul Watson directed the Whites' only touchdown, hitting freshman Alex Richardson on an 18-yard pass to cap an 11-play, 75-yard drive. On the final play of the first half, redshirt freshman Warren Claassen hit a 37-yard field goal for the Whites to make the score 42-10.

To keep things interesting, the 'Cat coaching staff reversed the score at intermission, giving the Whites a 42-10 lead.

It didn't matter. The Purples scored three times in the third quarter, including touchdown runs of one and 72 yards by Jackson. Straw and Smith teamed up on an 8-yard pass for their third touchdown.

Watson switched jerseys in the fourth quarter and led the first teamers on a pair of scoring drives. The Kansas City, Mo., native found Smith for a 49-yard touchdown, then hit tight end Russ Campbell on a 69-yard pass for the game's final

Watson completed 17-of-26 passes for 248 yards playing for both teams. Straw finished the game 14-of-19 for 369 yards and four touchdowns.

There's no comparison (between where we are this year compared to last year)," Snyder said. "We're not there yet, but we're one hell of a better football team today than we were a year ago."

Cats sign Williams

Keary Williams, a 6-9, 230-pound forward has become the third player to sign a national basktball letter of intent with K-State. The announcement was made Thursday by Wildcat head coach Dana Altman.

Williams originally hails from Pine Bluff, Ark., but spent the last two seasons at Cloud County Community College in Concordia. As a sophomore, he helped the Thunderbirds to a 26-6 record by averaging 11.0 points and 10.0 rebounds per game. He shot 55.8 percent from the field and 71.4 percent from the Williams' junior college career scoring best of 24 points came in the Region VI playoffs against Labette Community College. He also pulled down a career-high 16 rebounds in

"Keary does a lot of the things that we will need," Altman said. "He's a solid-rebounder with good hands and a soft shooting touch. We graduated four inside players. We're looking for big players with the versatility to contribute in a couple of different areas."

As a senior at Pine Bluff High School, Williams was an allstater after averaging 20 points, 11 rebounds and three blocked shots per game under coach Joe Ball. That club finished 20-7

Williams joins 6-9 Darryl King of Midland (Texas) Community College and 6-9 Hamilton Strickland of Mays High School in Atlanta, Ga., as K-State's signees for 1990.

Royals' White put on DL

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) - Second baseman Frank White was put on the 15-day disabled list Sunday by the Kansas City Royals.

White has a minor tear in his left quadricep. The move was retroactive to April 27. The Royals recalled second baseman Terry Shumpert from their Class AAA team at Omaha to take White's spot on the Quisenberry, 37, signed with the Giants as a free agent on Jan. 26, 1990, after spending 91/4 seasons with Kansas City and 11/2 with St. Louis. He appeared in five games with the Giants, going 0-1 with a 13.50 ERA.

Frost chip-in edges Norman

NEW ORLEANS (AP) - David Frost holed a blast from the sand from 50 feet on the 18th hole Sunday to edge Greg Norman by one stroke in the $1 million USF&G Classic.

It was the first tournament victory for Frost since he won the World Series of Golf last year, and it stifled a typical Sunday rally by Norman, a player who should be getting used to losing tournaments in spectacular fashion.

Pros, locals compete in Triathlon

By The Collegian Staff

About 200 people participated in the fifth annual Taxi Triathlon Sunday, said Theta Xi member Dennis Marstall.

Theta Xi fratemity sponsored the event, which consisted of a 700-yard pool swim, 14½ -mile bike race and 3.1 mile run in Manhattan. All proceeds will be donated to the National Multiple Sclerosis Society. MS is an incurable disease of the central nervous system.

"It was definitely a very safe race this year," said Taxi Triathlon chairman Phil Gilbert. "We should be able to give Multiple Sclerosis between $2,500 and $3,000."

The route began with the swimming portion at the Natatorium, followed by the bike race and running portion through Manhattan and campus.

"It was a good race for the ones serious about competing and for the first-timers who were seeing if they like it, trying their wings," Gilbert said. "The volunteers deserved a thank-you for helping out, too."

Clark Campbell, a Lawrence professional triathlete, won the men's division with a time of 1:00:05, while Tracy Anderson of Manhattan finished second with 1:04:22.

In the women's division, D'Anne Larsen of Manhattan won with a time of 1:13:32.

Triathletes could also enter the event as part of a team of three people. The Taxi Triathlon awarded the top mixed, women's and men's

The winning mixed team, They Signed Me Up, had a time of 1:09:15. Members were Don Avant, Jeff Fox and former K-State track and cross country standout Alysun Deckert.

The Carbo Burners won the women's team division in 1:16:30. Team members were Heide Oehme, Marilyn Avery and LeeAnn Heuser, while Jim Rose, Gary Bond and Steve Palmer joined The Kid Slowed Me Down to win the men's team division in 1:01:19. The triathlon attracted many difthey show. It doesn't bother me if I don't win." The triathlon is an activity Smith said more people should try because of the benefits one receives from training.

Jeremy Smith, a 13-year-old from Gladstone, Mo., said he participated because his two uncles, Don and David Herron, bet him he could not finish. He did, but he lost the bet because he ran two minutes over the time limit of the bet.

"After the swim, my leg muscles started tightening up in time for the biking and running so I could not feel them," Jeremy Smith said. Many K-State students also participated in the race.

Freshman Kevin Sampson said he had support during the race but the racing was up to him.

"It's pretty laid back and a good first race," he said. "The hardest part was transferring from biking to running."

Shauna Murphey, 27, made her way to the finish line of the Taxi Triath-Ion Sunday. Murphey was third in her age group.

MDA dance marathon raises $2,000

Low number of dancers causes event to end 5 hours earlier than planned

By Donna Warren Collegian Reporter

The K-State MDA Crew raised about $2,000 for the Muscular Dystrophy Association at its first all-campus dance marathon Friday and Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Jim Gewecke, graduate student in business administration and faculty adviser for the group, said the MDA Crew was organized as a campus organization with the purpose of raising funds for MDA.

Doug Holoubek, junior in business management, said the group chose a 24-hour dance marathon as a fund-raiser because several members of the group were involved in a MDA dance marathon for Moore Hall residents last year.

"The group wanted to expand the event in order to include all the residence halls, greek houses and off-campus students," Holoubek said.

Kenny Martin, junior in architecture, said packets were given to students to collect donations and pledges. The packets were turned in at the dance, and the person who raised the most money in donations received a 10-speed bicycle.

Various members of the MDA Crew worked on committees to obtain donations from local merchants in order to provide the music, food and drinks for the participants, he Sheri Leavitt, chairwoman for the event and senior in life science and women's studies, said while this year was fun, it was also experimental. She said she hopes each year the dance will get progressively better.

"The overall goal we have is to get the event started and to make K-State students aware of the dance so it can continue," Leavitt said.

Although the dance was scheduled to last from 7 p.m. Friday until 7 p.m. Saturday, it ended about 2 p.m. Saturday. Martin said the dance was cut short because not many people were still dancing by Saturday afternoon. People could come and go from the dance at any time and were not required to begin on Friday evening, he said. Donation packets were collected until 5 p.m. Saturday.

Holoubek said 78 students participated in the dance.

Lynn Bridwell, junior in elemen-tary education, was one of seven people who stayed at the dance the entire time. She said she participated because it was fun that helped a worthy

Ernst said in the early 1970s, K-State students used to have an annual "bump-a-thon" in a local bar.

The students usually raised enough money to be able to present the check to MDA on television at the Jerry Lewis Telethon.

'Future of Kansas Survey' conducted

College of Human Ecology finds most ment to allocate tax money to defense, social services, transportation citizens believe property taxes too high

By Sandy Hegarty Collegian Reporte

The well-being of Kansans was the topic of an annual survey launched in March by the Department of Human Development and Family Studies in the College of Human Ecology.

The study, known as "The Future of Kansas Survey," also marked the establishment of a Computer Assisted Telephone Interviewing Laboratory sponsored by the College of Human Ecology and the Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station.

'CATI allowed us to pick telephone numbers at random," said John Murray, professor of human development and family studies. "We can do overnight surveys in the new Kansans were asked their views on a range of topics including education, taxes, family life and child development.

The 316 participants were evenly divided between men and women. According to the survey report, they reflected the ethnic diversity of the state and included broad representation of rural, urban and suburban

The age range of the people surveyed was 18 to 94, with the average age of the participant being 45, Murray said.

"The people were slightly better educated," he said, "but we ended up with a nice diversity.'

The first profile report from the survey focuses the views that Kansans hold about taxes and the ways in which they would like their government to allocate tax money to deand education.

"What is significant is that these attitudes are reflecting the national reordering of priorities," Murray said. "That view comes through. whether residents live in rural, urban or suburban areas and regardless if they are men or women.'

Murray said he was struck by the opinions received on taxes and how the government should spend

Seventy-eight percent of those surveyed said they believe property taxes are too high, 58 percent feel income taxes are too high, 38 percent believe social security taxes are too high and 36 percent believe sales taxes were too high.

Kansans are also quite sure about where their tax dollars should be spent, Murray said. As a group, they would like to see reductions in government defense spending and increases in spending on public education. Seventy-two percent of the Kansans surveyed want education spending increased and 51 percent want defense spending decreased. Men are even more supportive of decreases in defense spending than are women.

"It's no surprise to me that Kansans should pick education as a priority, because education is held in high esteem," Murray said. "Education is viewed as an avenue by which people advance in their lives.

The consensus is that it is time to move toward more education and human services spending, Murray said. Kansans would also like to see more care for the elderly.

"We hope to learn a little more of what Kansans expect in the future," said Ann Coulson, assistant professor of human development and famliy studies. "This will also help with our classes."

with all aspects of the needs of the family from birth to death," Murray

Subsequent profile reports will address the other issues covered in the survey. These topics include the well being of children, youth and families in Kansas, Murray said.

"Many of the same questions will be asked annually in our survey," he said. "Some will be changed and some will be different depending the situation."

Mackey said language can often be an indicator of hidden assumptions.

"I quite often in class have students from Kansas talk about 'Negroes,' and apparently it's commonly used, but it's tipping us off here about how that group of whites thinks about African-Americans," Mackey said. "They're still using the term 'Negro,' which hasn't been widely used since the 1950s, early

"I mean, the label carries more meaning," he said. "And although it may be just unconscious, common usage, that doesn't mean it isn't offensive."

A non-racist student who tolerates racism in others is just as guilty as the racist person, said Greg Williams, junior in chemical engineering.

"I don't believe the majority of people at K-State are racist. I believe there are a few that are," Williams said. "But when you have a friend insults are directed at members of

Classified employees who are victims are usually reassigned to other areas. When a student is a victim in a class situation, he or she is usually reassigned to another class section and provided with extra tutoring, and the grading procedures of the instruclast sexual harassment report, seven ended with a letter of admonishment being sent to the respondent. In one instance the respondent had to submit a paper on sexual harassment. Two respondents were required to attend counseling and a seminar on harassment. One case resulted in the

"We want these cases brought to the attention of our office," Rowlett said. "We want the burden of changing the problem on the University. We don't want the students or faculty who makes racial remarks, and you still consider that person your friend, then you're condoning that type of action as socially acceptable.

"Racism is socially acceptable," he said. "Racism is not legally acceptable, but it is socially acceptable."

Problems with race relations often stem from ignorance or a lack of communication between groups. John Kitchings, sophomore in psychology, said white students are not aware of how African-American students feel in today's society.

'The (white students) I've talked to have no direct day-to-day contact (with African-American students)," Kitchings said.

Some African-American students said they face prejudice in the classroom on a day-to-day basis.

React

"I had a class, and I was the only (African-American student) in class," said Evonne Truclove, sophomore in business administration. "(The professor) never called on me when I raised my hand. When I answered a question correctly, he looked shocked. Until it's a black thing, he won't bother with you. Then you're an expert."

"The white faculty have the attitude that the needs of black students are the same as the needs of white students," Kitchings said.

Anne Butler, associate with Educational Support Services, said the students' concern about equality in classrooms is not new. She has been at K-State for 12 years.

"Over the years, I've definitely heard students speak of feelings of isolation and alienation in the classroom and of not being included," Butler said. "The number (of incidences) may change, or it may remain the same, but people's responses to it might be what's differing.'

Part of the problem stems from the organizational structure of the University itself, Butler said. It has not changed significantly since it was established in 1869.

"(K-State) was created and designed to serve a population quite unlike the population it finds facing its doors today," Butler said. "There simply has to be an examination of the assumptions under which institutes like student government are operating.

"Does the structure, does the prevailing philosophy, allow for a diverse range of participants as well as ideologies, or is it one set philosophy clinging to a historical origin?" she

Williams said minority students want what every other student wants a good education.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said she was disappointed with the Senate's rejection of three-fourths funding for the adjustment. She said she has spoken with other representatives who want the omnibus appropriations bill held so that the House conference committee can finish work on the funding.

The omnibus bill has already been passed by the Senate and is scheduled for discussion in the House this afternoon. The bill is a catchall appropriations measure usually passed by the Legislature as the closing act

"We are trying in the House to keep the omnibus bill from coming up before the regents' budget is wrapped up and sent to the gover-' she said.

"I don't think it was unexpected," said James Koelliker, Faculty Senate president. "I think the University has all the money it is going to get. Now we need to decide how best to use it."

Koelliker said Kansas is doing well in the funding of higher education. He said the state ranks 15th to 20th annually in spending per capita for higher education. Difficulties arise from the large number of institutions in the state that split the budget.

Students also reacted negatively to the failure of Oleen's amendment. "It is like a stab in the back," said

Peter LaGue, sophomore in environmental design, who traveled to the Statehouse Wednesday to lobby for Coffee and a Collegian... A Good Habit.

Second American hostage freed

Bush welcomes release, thanks Syria, Iran; 16 Westerners remain captive in Lebanon for help in bringing it about but added, "We cannot rest ... until all

By The Associated Press

DAMASCUS, Syria - American hostage Frank Reed was freed Monday after being held more than 31/2 "lonely ... boring" years by Shiite Moslem kidnappers in Lebanon. He was the second American freed in nine days.

Syrian officials said the 57-yearold educator from Malden, Mass., was freed in Beirut at 8:30 p.m. (12:30 p.m. CDT) and driven to the Syrian capital, where U.S. ambassador Edward Djerejian was waiting to greet him at the Syrian Foreign Interviewed by Syrian television after his release, Reed appeared pale and smoked a cigarette.

He was asked what captivity was

"It was lonely, it was boring," he said.

"I'm very happy to be free ... and I hope my fellow hostages will be freed very soon. I want to say to my family, especially to my son Tarek: 'Daddy is well ... and will be home very soon."

Asked why he thought he was captured, he replied: "No one ever said why I was taken. The bottom line was, I was an American."

Reed arrived at the Foreign Ministry at 11:20 p.m. (3:20 p.m. CDT) in a gray Peugeot. He was escorted out of the car by two Syrian security men, and whisked into the building through a side door.

The security men helped the white-haired Reed out of the car. But then he walked by himself into the ministry, where he appeared before a news conference.

In Beirut, Reed was handed to officers of the Syrian army contingent that controls east and north Lebanon as well as Moslem west Beirut, where Reed was kidnapped Sept. 9, 1986, said the Syrian officials, who refused to be identified.

They refused to say exactly where the release occurred. Journalists at the Summerland Hotel in Beirut, leased, said they did not see Reed. correspondent for The Associated Northview Elementary School has been selected as one of four schools nationwide to be featured in a documentary by the MacNeil/ Lehrer production company.

"This documentary will highlight these four successful schools and what about them makes them so successful," said Northview principal Dan Yunk. The documentary, "Learning in America: The Early Years," is scheduled to be aired during the first week in September.

Bob Chandler, executive producer of the program said, "We wanted a successful school even though they might be against serious odds," such as limited funding and discipline problems.

"The whole focus at Northview will be on a particular grade level to be representative of the whole school," Yunk said.

Schools in Landover, Md; Lowell, Mass. and Corpus Christi, Texas will also be part of the documentary.

Northview's contribution to the 90-minute special will be Rene Maule's fourth-grade class.

Editor's note: This is the second installment in a series.

Introducing African-American students into the University mainstream may still be an ongoing process, even though the challenge is more than 40 years old. Veryl Switzer, associate director of Intercollegiate Athletics, attended K-State from 1950 to 1954. Switzer was the only African-American person on the football team while he was here and the first to compete in track in the Big Eight. During his junior year. Switzer was the only African-American football player in the conference.

"Ethnic and racial minorities did not have rights - social rights, civil rights as such - during the period I was in school," Switzer said. "We were prior to the civil rights movement, the Civil Rights Act. We were prior to Brown vs. the Board of Education in Topeka, Kansas. We were treated as second-class citizens."

White people were usually unaware of the extent of the discrimination African-Americans faced, he said

"When I went into pro football, as well as while I was at K-State, a lot of my teammates didn't realize we were denied housing accommodations as black people, that we were denied places at restaurants, until they experienced it with me physically," Switzer said. "I would in fact go into a restaurant with my teammates, and we were turned back because I happened to be black.

"That may have been one of the first times ever that a white person was refused service, but the reason why was because they were in my company," he said.

Although Switzer was recognized as a football All-American, he said that except for his friends, he was still treated based on his skin color by most people.

"However, I felt treated badly because my black peers were treated differently, in some cases by those who treated me with somewhat equal respect," Switzer said.

Ten years after Switzer graduated, the federal government passed the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to guarantee minorities equal access to public facilities, such as restaurants, hotels and even water fountains.

When Paula Blair Weaver arrived at K-State in 1966, racism was legally unacceptable but still evident on campus. Weaver, now an AT&T assistant controller for consumer products in New Jersey, was K-State's first African-American homecoming like an outsider at the University. When her parents brought her to move into the dormitory, a white woman - her roommate - was already queen in 1968. She was also the first African-American woman in Mortar

Weaver said she immediately felt moved into the room. "I remember this vividly: As soon as she saw me, she immediately had the room changed," Weaver said. "I remember being offended, but I didn't feel I had any recourse in the situation. We were compliant, never said anything offensive to whites. We knew our place." The other African-Americans Weaver said she knew on campus cooked or cleaned for sororities. As an African-American female, she said she felt she had to work harder than whites. "I felt it at K-State, and I've felt it every day since then," Weaver said. "Most of the time I was the 'first' or 'only,' so I felt very isolated," she said. About 50 African-American men and seven or eight African-American women were students at the time.

Switzer returned to K-State in 1969 as director of minority affairs and administrative assistant to the athletic director. Once again, he was a pioneer — this time as the first African-American administrative professional hired by the University.

During the 15 years Switzer had been away, K-State had increased its number of African-American athletes. Switzer said that in 1969, African-Americans represented about 30 percent of the football team and 40-45 percent of the basketball

"Kansas State was the first institution in the (Big Eight) conference to integrate its athletic program, so Kansas State University was the first institution to integrate its staff racially," he said.

As director of minority affairs, Switzer helped to develop minority study programs, tutorial services and recruiting. He encouraged the growth of organizations such as Black Student Union, United Black Voices and the African-American greek system.

"We had some people, students as well as adults - faculty and staff that were somewhat insensitive of change that occurred in the '70s," Switzer said. "However, I think the majority of people supported change. Therefore, some change occurred.'

One of the changes in the mid-1970s was the participation of African-American students in student government. About 15 years ago, Switzer said, six or seven student senators were African-American. Bernard Franklin was one of those leaders. In 1976, Franklin was elected by write-in votes as the first African-American student body president. He is now director of student activities at Rollins College in

Schools threatened by budget cuts By Lori Mikesell

As legislators continue work on the state budget, they face increasing pressure for across-the-board spending cuts which would include reductions to the Board of Regents budget, said Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan.

Legislators have already allocated nearly $30 million more, than Gov. Mike Hayden requested, which would pull the state's general fund balance down to $72.6 million for the next fiscal year.

The social welfare budget sent to Hayden by the Legislature and the regents budget still to be passed exceed his recommendations by $43.9 million, unless adjustments are made. That is considerably short of the $100 million minimum balance the governor and legislative leaders have agreed should be maintained. 'We're voting to spend dollars we don't have," Oleen said.

The governor said he expects lawmakers to cut spending elsewhere in the budget, or impose an across-theboard reduction in spending to compensate for what lawmakers have committed to SRS and may spend on

'We have to be concerned. The regents budget is really $8 million over Governor Hayden's recommendations," said Stanley Koplik, regents executive director. Koplik said the proposed regents budget is $6.5 million over the governor's recommendations for fiscal year 1990 and $1.5 million over for fiscal year 1991. The regents dollars won't stay unless we can find alternative ways to finance the general fund," Oleen

One possible cost-cutting measure gaining interest among lawmakers, Oleen said, is a cap on property tax windfalls which would put money into the general fund. Estimates of the amount of money generated by such a cap are not yet available.

However, increasing monetary pressures mean that the fight to fund K-State is not over, she said.

'We must continue to find additional funding for the enrollment adjustment while ensuring that the regents budget is not revisited for across-the-board cuts," Oleen said.

The recent drive to maintain funding for higher education has had at least one positive effect, Oleen said.

"The Legislature will be hesitant to try to cut the budget. People are more than aware of the lack of investment in higher education," Oleen

Hayden said Saturday he was not opposed to the programs being funded by the Legislature, but reiterated his concern that lawmakers were not leaving enough money in the treasury for the safe operation of state government.

A $72.6 million general fund balance at the end of next fiscal year would represent only 2.9 percent of expenditures. Hayden wanted a 5 percent balance when the session opened, but has agreed to a $100 million balance, which would be about 4

Latvians call for independence

MOSCOW (AP) — A Latvian citizen's group claiming to represent hundreds of thousands of Latvians demanded Monday that the republic follow Lithuania's lead and declare independence from the Soviet Union, a spokeswoman said.

In Lithuania, about 20,000 people gathered to honor a countryman who burned himself to death in Moscow to protest the Kremlin's efforts to end Lithuania's independence drive.

Lithuanian President Vytautas Landsbergis called the man "the first victim" in the struggle for independence. "And we hope he is the last," he told the crowd, according to Giedrius Drukteimis of the Sajudis pro-independence movement.

The Lithuanians continued their protests. The body of the suicide victim, Stanislovas Jamaitis, 52, was flown to Vilnius from Moscow on Monday and taken to the Supreme Council parliament building in central Vilnius, Drukteimis said.

Lithuanian radio and television broadcast announcements of the memorial service for Jamaitis, and Soviet TV showed brief footage Monday night of the crowds gathered near the parliament building.

Jamaitis is to be buried Wednesday in his home village of Ezherelis near Kaunas, the republic's second city.

Landsbergis, in a television appearance Monday, discouraged other Lithuanians from similar actions.

Bush chooses canal manager

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush announced his nomination of the first-ever Panamanian to manage the Panama Canal as he told that nation's new president Monday that the United States "will stand with you in peace."

Bush, in his first meeting with President Guillermo Endara since the U.S. invasion of Panama last December, also voiced support for Endara's proposal to speed up a study on the feasibility of widening the 86-year-old waterway.

But saying "the struggle is not over in Panama," Bush chastised Congress for not moving quicker on his $800 million aid package for Panama and Nicaragua. The measure is snagged in the Senate in side disputes, including one on federal funding for abortions.

"I've asked and asked again that our aid package to the newly liberated people of Panama be passed and passed swiftly. And still it waits, and with it the future of the fledgling democracy," said Bush, Endara at his side, after the two leaders met for 2½ hours.

Crop insurance to continue

WASHINGTON (AP) — Winter wheat farmers can breathe easier now that the Agriculture Department has assured them insurance will be available for their next crop, lawmakers say. The Federal Crop Insurance Corp. notified the insurance industry last week that the government would offer the policies until Congress changes the program or abolishes it.

USDA had announced that the insurance might not be available for 1991, because of President Bush's proposal to end federal participation in the program.

"A lot of farmers were very much concerned about what was going to happen with the crop insurance program ... prior to the time the new farm bill was passed," Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., said Monday.

"Obviously it gives us some time to refashion the crop insurance program and address some of the concerns for disaster protection," Daschle said.

Judge supports Dixieland jazz

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — Artists and shop owners driven to distraction by loud brass bands blaring Dixieland jazz in the heart of the French Quarter lost their fight Monday to establish court-ordered quiet.

State Judge Richard Ganucheau rejected a request that he order police to enforce New Orleans anti-noise ordinances in Jackson Square, an area of stone sidewalks and greenery between the quarter's St. Louis Cathedral and the Mississippi River.

Novelty shops, bars and artists who set up booths on the sidewalks cater to tourists in the area, as do street musicians who collect money thrown into their hats or empty instrument

At a hearing Friday, a city attorney argued that city police already try to enforce the anti-noise ordinances by using decibel meters. But, he said, the offending bands play more softly when they know they are being monitored.

The Association of Businessmen and Artists of Jackson Square argued that more police manpower and more discreet use of the meters would help.

Police say they do the best they can with the manpower available.

Senate defeats tax rollback

TOPEKA (AP) — The Senate for the third time crushed a proposed property tax rollback bill late Monday, sending majority Republican leaders groping for ways to rekindle the issue and build support for it.

Defeat of the latest rollback proposal, 11-27, was a major setback to a quick conclusion of the Legislature's wrap-up session, which will be in its sixth day on Tuesday.

After defeating the bill, the Senate debated at length how to keep the dialogue going on property tax reduction, which Gov. Mike Hayden and legislative leaders have said is the No. 1 issue of the 1990 session.

The bill that lost would have raised $213.2 million new revenue by increasing the sales tax, expanding the sales tax base, raising corporate income tax rates and creating a new individual income tax bracket to tax high-income people at a higher rate, and used the money to reduce school property taxes by 29

The Senate previously rejected two attempts to raise the sales tax only to provide property tax relief.

The Senate barely voted to keep this bill alive, 20-10, with leaders hoping it could be used as the vehicle to try some other approach and get a tax rollback bill passed yet this session.

Affirmative Action Plan update shows applicant pools lack minorities, women and federal regulations.

The plan, a policy covering all aspects of University employment, is required by state

Jane Rowlett, director of the Affirmative Action Office, said these federal orders require that institutions receiving federal funding have a plan summarizing legal employment guidelines, recruitment procedures and implementation goals and results.

The Affirmative Action Office sets goals, monitors recruitment and gathers availability data on minorities and women," she said. "The Office of Federal Contract Compliance reviews the plan to see if we comply with the regulations.

Rowlett said the office is responsible for the plan, and all reports of information must be kept up-to-date.

"Revisions are usually in the data," she said. "For example, (we look at) the number of positions open and the number of applicants. Through this, we can get a good picture of the rates we are looking at with women and minorities compared to others."

With the update, Rowlett said, the University can get an overview of where each department stands in meeting its applicant availability estimates, recruitment effectiveness and hiring of women and minorities.

In a summary of the results of the University's recruitment and selection activities, the update stated a large proportion of University applicant pools did not contain either minorities or women in the numbers predicted by

In administrative units, availability of minorities in the applicant pools remained the same and the availability of women decreased, lowering the number of women in the applicant pools to seven less than anticipated by estimates.

Despite failure to meet goals in administrative units, gains were made toward increasing the availability of minorities and women in academic units.

The update stated that recruitment of minorities and women must be more effective if substantial progress is to be made and goals are to be met. President Jon Wefald said improving recruitment effectiveness is a high priority in University planning.

"We try to keep that (recruitment) on the front burner," he said. "We work very close with the deans, department chairs and Affirmative Action Office to keep that upmost in our minds.'

Wefald said a two-part development in the University's strategic planning is a key component in solving the problems with inefficient recruitment of minority and women applicants.

Part I of the planning focuses on previous changes and improvements made at the University, while Part II summarizes the development of a strategic plan that concentrates on programs the University intends to emphasize during the next five years.

Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology, said high underutilization can be controlled by believing in the affirmative action plan and equal opportunity employment.

'We need to provide opportunities to individuals who are minorities and women," Johnson said. "This is always done in regards to quality, which needs to come first, whether we are filling a faculty or research position."

In order to make recruitment more effective, Johnson said, the Division of Biology contacts minority schools and professional women's organizations through a letter asking them to inform their constituents about available jobs at K-State.

Law Board changes among goals for mayor

By Laura Scroggins Collegian Reporter

Restructuring the Riley County Law Board is on the list of goals Manhattan Mayor Richard Hayter plans to achieve during his oneyear appointment that began in mid-April. Hayter outlined his goals to the city commissioners April 17.

Hayter's total agenda includes continuing projects started by former mayor Kent Glasscock, achieving a list of goals of his own for the year and establishing more planning sessions between himself and other city commissioners.

Hayter said he will address the rental inspection program, which was undertaken by Glasscock.

Concern has surfaced that the commissioners have tabled discussion on the issue, he said, but that is not the case. Although Hayter said he is not prepared to address or resolve the issue, he said the issue will be carried through to a conclusion.

Of his own five goals, the issue of most concern to Hayter is the way in which the Law Board is formed, which addresses the budget of the Riley County Police Department.

The Law Board, since its formation along with the consolidated law enforcement of the RCPD in 1972, has been made up of appointed officials who have been elected to serve other positions in the community.

Because the board deals primarily with the RCPD budget (slated to exceed $4 million in 1991), it has the power to tax the community. Hayter said he believes a taxing body should be directly accountable to the electorate. Hayter said he will look closely at the structuring of the board, and how it can be improved.

"The fact that all the people who serve on the seven-person law board are appointed rather than elected, yet have taxing authority, is why I think there is a need to take a look at it again," Hayter said.

A second project of Glasscock's Hayter plans to continue is the Blank Page Economic Development Task Force. This, he said, studies the way in which funding is approached. The blank page means no precedents will be taken into consideration when funding is being considered. Only the individual program will be taken into account.

of the faculty expressed their reasons for requiring attendance in their classes. With due respect to my colleagues who do require attendance, I would like to give several reasons why I have never, in 38 years of college teaching, both as a graduate assistant and a full-time faculty member at four major midwestern universities - the University of Kansas, Wisconsin, Illinois and K-State - required students to attend my n article appeared recently in the Collegian in which a few members sional obligations off campus or an inability to get a substitute prevent me from doing so. But I always notify students when I will be absent. Otherwise, I must appear; they may choose whether or not to do so.

Second, college students are young adults and one of the first things they should learn at college, if they haven't already, is a way to meet their primary academic responsibilities: doing assigned homework, preparing for classes and regularly attending them. If we require students to attend class, we deprive them of a significant opportunity to develop the kind of self-discipline that will benefit them their entire lives.

Third, a large percentage of the students who are absent from my classes have good reasons for being gone: illness, serious family or personal problems; conflicts with other academic responsibilites or obligations; and nor I especially appreciate. Students with serious family or personal problems rarely wish to present these in great detail to a faculty member who is interrogating them closely to determine whether or not an absence is legitimate. I have had students, however, who volunteered such information, and it has given me occasional insights into the terrifically stressful lives they lead. I care a great deal about my students' emotional and intellectual lives, but I do not believe it is any of my business to pry into their personal affairs. I try, however, to show compassion and give moral support to those in difficulty, and not to hassle them about missing class.

As a matter of fact, I prefer that students who are ill with communicative diseases stay away from class. By coming they may infect a good number of their classmates and me.

Il of us have students who serve with distinction in campus organizations or who are called away from class because they must attend ceremonies in which they are being recognized. And we have the athletes, too, whose scholarships obligate them to be away from campus many times to represent the University. I think too much of their time is given to athletics because they are under pressure from coaches, who are under pressure to win. That is another issue, however, which is beyond the scope of this column.

A significant number of students commute to this campus. How can we expect them to be always prepared for the unexpected flat tire, the wreck or unannounced construction work that blocks traffic for so long that they miss class, or the vagarities of Kansas weather, particularly in winter? I would never expect a student to drive over dangerously icy highways just to avoid missing class.

Finally, as some faculty commenting in the story observed, students who do their work on time and attend class regularly perform better on papers and tests. They should; Donald C. Stewart is a professor of English.

otherwise, nothing of significance is happening in class. If a student can pass my classes without attending, more power to him or her. I have found very few who could, however, and certainly not with distinction. Not many students are satisfied with D's.

I do have a suggestion, however, for students who cut class half the time without good reason and then write on semester-end teachers' evaluations that "the instructor did not explain things clearly." It's hard to understand what's going on in class when you have knowledge of only half the context for the material being presented.

In summary, I think we should recognize that a university is a place where varied resources are available to students who take full advantage of them. Classes are one of those resources. It is the student's choice, not the faculty member's responsibility, to see how wisely and how well they take advantage of this particular resource.

These are the provisions in a bill now being debated in the Florida legislature. Certain legislators there seem to believe editorial writers should disclose their financial records to reveal any personal biases they might have because of their investments. They also seem to think that signed editorials would be, as they would say, "more responsible."

This is stupid. First off, most survey showed that journalism graduates tied with home economics majors as being the lowest paid college graduates. What good would disclosing these records do?

Values are similar

Editor,

As an exchange student from K-State's West German partner university, I feel very offended by Brad Seabourn's column on a united Germany.

He should view a united Germany as the success of American-West German cooperation and a victory for freedom and democracy. Germans are not driven by a Hitlerian vision; rather, we have a lot in common with Americans as far as values and visions go. This also holds true for the German businessman, who certainly faces ethical dilemmas on a daily basis. But isn't the "all-in-the-nameof-money philosophy" a global, capitalistic phenomenon?

However, if Seabourn has found a solution to ethical dilemmas in management, he may offer his knowledge to masters of business administration students and managers around the world.

Beer sales wrong

It's true that every suggestion for improvement should have a reason. But the latest proposal by the Athletic Ticket Sales Committee - which I perceive to be backed by the Student Senate - to sell beer in the stadium and allow it in the parking lot to increase ticket sales, is a defeatist attitude.

Let me explain: First, people are going to drink before, during and after the games. There are ways to sneak alcohol into the stadium, and I'm sure clever partiers have discovered these. You can't stop them.

Second, how much do you think this beer this resolution passes. will cost? Two dollars per cup? Two-and-ahalf dollars per cup, maybe even more? Whatever the price, it will obviously be ### cheaper to acquire your own before the game. Third, I'm sure this will start a trend. Organizers of every activity on campus will want to sell beer to increase participation. Perhaps even some professors will want to seve beer in their classrooms to get students to attend more regularly.

No! No! This is not the way to increase ticket sales. I'm also appalled that this would be used as a reason. The only way to increase ticket sales is to get a decent football team. If the coaching staff and the KSU Athletic Department can't accomplish this, perhaps the entire football program should be discontinued.

Resolution bad idea

We were shocked and embarrassed for K-State to read Student Senate is recommending not only allowing alcohol to be consumed in the KSU Stadium parking lot, but permitting beer sales in the stadium.

In view of the fact that many sports facili-ties are curtailing sales of alcoholic beverages in order to prevent rowdy behavior, this resolution seems to be a giant step in the wrong direction. Moreover, we think that after the football team has worked so hard to improve, it would be an insult to the team to bribe people with alcohol to come and see

We have attended K-State football games for many years, each year hoping for a better season. # Letter half correct

I am writing to take issue with Nancy Hause, an assistant professor of journalism and mass communications at K-State. She wrote a letter stating that Brad Seabourn is not a columnist, not a journalist, not a Christian and not a Nazi. I believe that Hause is only 50 percent correct. For sure Seabourn is both a columnist (a writer who conducts a column) and a journalist (a writer for a periodical). Perhaps he is one of the best columnists and journalists to have worked for the K-State Collegian.

Definitely Seabourn is not a Christian or a Nazi. He also understands how to use the term bastard (a child begotten and born out of wedlock) properly. It seems strange to me that we have a faculty member at this University in the department of journalism and mass communications who apparently does not understand any of those definitions, as well as the operation of one of the better elements of this newspaper, its editorial page.

Botanical cures have medicinal benefits

By Tim Clopton Collegian Reporter

When the rage of a headache has reached the outer limits, don't buy aspirin, chew on the bark of a willow tree.

Although this statement may sound absurd, plants and herbs have been used as remedies throughout history, and their elements are often used in medicine today.

Theodore Barkley, professor of biology, said one example of the folklore associated with herbal and plant medicine is the belief that chewing on the inside of the bark of a willow tree would relieve headaches.

"If we were talking in ancient Rome and you would say 'I've got a headache,' then I would say, 'well there's a willow tree out there that will take care of it,'" Barkley said.

"We can poke fun at these things, but we shouldn't because we survived," he said. "A lot of things that we do have a root that goes back into herbal medicine. It is unimportant to us now, in this very sophisticated age, as to what the real root of it was."

Most people realize that herbs are healthy but few understand the medicinal value of them today, said Richard Mattson, professor of horticulture.

Once chemists began experimenting with willow tree bark, they found that it contains salacidic acid. The researchers then combined the salacidic acid with a methal group to form methal salacite which is synthesized and called aspirin, Barkley

If investigation indicates that some plant has a medical effect, it is studied by people in pharmacology and medicine who try to synthesize it in the laboratory and control the quality of it, he said.

Before technology was able to break down the elements of the plants, society merely used what worked.

"In Renaissance and post-Renaissance days, people grew a lot of plants that were beleived to be curatives for whatever ailed you," Barkley said.

He said that "wort," the old English word for plant, is often associated with herbs and plants that were believed to have healing powers. Liverwort was used to cure liver disease, and pilewort was a plant used to fight against hemorrhoids. Another plant, foxglove, has been used for irregular heartbeats for years, Barkley said.

Performance tradition lasts 10 years, benefits bands

By Stacle Sanders Collegian Reporter

A joint concert featuring the 1st Infantry Division Band from Fort Riley and the K-State Symphonic Wind Ensemble is at 8 p.m. today in Union Forum Hall.

Stan Finck, assistant professor of music, said the 1st Infantry Division Band will perform several marches during the first half of the concert.

"They're doing a variety of marches all the way from concert marches to marches that have been written for the division," he said.

Finck said the marches performed by the 1st Infantry Division Band are appealing because most people think of marches when they think of a band.

The Symphonic Wind Ensemble will present the second half of the concert.

Finck said the ensemble will perform a well-known Shostakovich piece titled "Festive Overture," followed by two other pieces by contemporary artists.

"They're certainly not avantgarde contemporary composers," he said. "They're listenable."

Finck said the ensemble's performance should be enjoyable.

"The Wind Ensemble this year is very strong," he said. "It's one of the best groups I've had since I've been here."

The concert was originally scheduled to take place last fall, Finck

Alfred Cochran, assistant professor of music, started the annual joint band concert 10 years ago.

Cochran said the concert enables the two music groups to get to know each other better.

Since then, the Fort Riley band performed at the University and the University bands have performed at the fort, Cochran said.

"I think it has been a very positive influence," he said.

The performance is free to the public and should last a little more than an hour, Finck said.

'Cats swept twinbill

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

It was a day at the ballpark that K-State coach Mike Clark would probably rather forget, but it's one his players will be asked to remember when they take the field for practice this afternoon.

A doubleheader loss to Southwest Missouri State Monday at Frank Myers Field wasn't exactly what Clark had pictured coming off a three-game weekend sweep of Northern Colorado.

But it's what he got, by 6-4 and 10-7 scores.

"We just stunk it up," Clark said bluntly. "Mentally, we just weren't ready to play baseball."

And Clark said he'll make sure his players learn a lesson from their lack of preparation.

"The way we played is cause for enough concern that we're going to talk about it tomorrow (Tuesday) at practice," he said. "Now is not the time to start doing this. But I have faith in the guys that they'll get their act together.'

Student Senate suffered an 18-7 defeat to the University administration in a softball game Monday at CiCo Park.

Norman philosophical about loss

By The Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS - "Again?" asked Greg Norman. "Again," said the roar of the crowd.

This time it was David Frost holing a brilliant shot to snuff a Sunday rally by Norman, in the $1 million USF&G Classic. In the past it's been Bob Tway, Larry Mize and, most recently, Robert Gamez.

"That's golf, I guess," said Norman. "I can't do anything about it. You just try to be as philosophical as you can about it."

He had done all he could to win it Sunday - a final round 65, best of the tournament; an eagle and seven birdies, including a birdie at No. 18, almost unreachable in regulation with the wind blowing directly down the 471-yard fairway.

There were three groups still out, including Frost's, when Norman put his second shot within nine inches of the cup on 18 for a tap-in birdie that left him tied with Frost at 11-under

He stood and chatted with tournament director Tommy Wulff as Frost parred 16 and 17. Frost, the thirdround leader, began the final round five strokes ahead of Norman, faltered on the front nine, then fought back to take a 1-shot lead.

Norman erased that lead with his

"Where's Frosty?" Norman asked. "In the greenside bunker," Wulff

Frost needed par to force a playoff, and he was in a tough spot - 208 of his ball buried in the sand. The safe path was to the right, around the water, then a layup for a par putt and a sudden-death playoff.

Frost went for it, lofting a 3-iron into the front bunker, 50 feet from the pin - still a tough spot, but exactly where he wanted to be.

Norman didn't watch. "Me go out and watch somebody else play golf? Are you kidding me?

He had his reasons. Four years ago, Tway's bunker shot beat him on the final hole of the PGA Championship tournament. Three years ago, Mize hit a 140-foot chip shot to beat him on the second hole of sudden death at the Masters. This year, Gamez holed a 176-yard chip shot yards over water to the pin, a fourth for an eagle to beat him on the final hole of the Nestle Invitational.

Frost blasted out of the bunker, leaped into the air and shouted, "You beauty!"

The crowd's roar interrupted Norman's conversation with Wulff. "What happened?" Norman

"He holed it," a spectator answered. Norman's birdie was only the second on No. 18 all day. Frost's was the

"They're there to make the shot," Norman said. "I can't do anything about it. I tried to win, and he won. You're as philosophical as you can be, and that's it.

"I played very well. I am pleased."

Alumnus assists refugees seeking political asylum

By Shannan Seely Collegian Reporter

For two years, K-State graduate Virgil Wiebe has helped Central American refugees gain political asylum in the United States.

A 1986 Rhodes Scholar, Wiebe received a bachelor's degree in political science, geography and pre-law.

Nancy Twiss, adviser in the College of Arts and Sciences, said K-State Rhodes scholars are difficult to describe in a few words.

Like other K-State Rhodes scholars, Virgil Wiebe has a moral force of character expressed in action on the behalf of others," she said.

Wiebe attained a master's degree with the Rhodes scholarship to study Latin America Studies at Oxford University in Oxford, England. He now works for the Overground Railroad in Harlingen, Texas.

"The Overground Railroad's basic purpose is to serve as a channel to get Central American political refugees to Canada and the United States," he said.

Wiebe said since 1983, the Overground Railroad has helped more than 1,150 refugees.

The railroad's name was inspired by the underground railroad of the Civil War, a group who helped free black slaves to the northern states of the United States, he said. Both organizations have helped people to reach freedom. However, the Over-ground Railroad helps legally through the Canadian and American immigration systems.

Wiebe said a political refugee is someone who fears harm in a country based on his race, religion, nationality or political or social beliefs.

Wiebe said when he meets with Central American refugees, he decides if they are interested in relocating to Canada or the United States, and if they have a strong case for political asylum.

One of the most important factors is to make sure they have someone to help them once they enter Canada or United States, Wiebe said. Canada is more generous and accepting of Central American refugees than the United States.

"Political refugee laws are interpreted strictly and politically in the United States," he said.

Wiebe said his current lifestyle reflects his academic interests.

"It's a quest for me on how to combine solid academic work and research with productive, active work in the world against injustice," he said.

At K-State, Wiebe wrote major research papers on religion and politics in Latin America. He also participated in the Manhattan Alliance of Central America.

"I was involved in academics as well as activism at K-State," he said. "I went to Oxford to focus on geography and religion in Central America. In Oxford, I stepped out of the activist role. I also stepped out of the American scene and saw life through a different perspective."

Wiebe said during his two-year stay in England, he became friends with Rhodes scholars from South Africa.

"I learned about their rent strikes, and how they dealt with infiltrators and being chased by whoever," he said.

One South African student told him about being chased by police because of his political beliefs, Wiebe said.

The South African student came to Oxford early because of the police's six-month pursuit, Wiebe said. The student barely got away from his house as the police entered to take him to a court

K-State students learn abroad

Rhodes scholars receive benefits from European educational, cultural experiences

By Shannan Seely Collegian Reporter

In the past 12 years, seven K-State students have received Rhodes scholarships.

Each year, 32 scholarships are awarded to U.S. college students and provide more than $30,000 to study at Oxford University for two years, according to the pamphlet "Student Scholars at K-State.

Three former Rhodes scholars from K-State said the opportunity to study at Oxford and travel in Europe enhanced their education.

Elaine Cleary, who received a bachelor's degree in microbiology, was a 1978 Rhodes Scholar.

Cleary studied human physiology at Oxford. She returned to the United States and attended John Hopkins University Medical School in Baltimore.

She is a physician of adult internal medicine in Denver. She works at a city-county hospital for low-income and uninsured patients.

Cleary also advises interns and residents at the hospital and teaches medical students at the University of Colorado about physical diagnosis and clinical methods.

"The best thing about (the Rhodes scholarship) was the fantastic educa-tional experience," she said. "Only part of it was studying and attending the college. To live in a another country similar in language but not similar in culture and to travel to see museums and art made it worthwhile." She said she met students from the United States, Canada, New Zealand, Australia, India and South Africa.

"I understand a little more now of the problems in world situations," she said. "For example, in a political discussion of apartheid, I would meet with people from South Africa who were strongly supporting it, as well as those strongly against it. I learned a lot and received some insights from people who grew up in that political system."

Cleary said that when she applied for the Rhodes scholarship, "it wasn't a big deal."

"I saw what was involved, learned it did not cost anything and (was) not hard to apply," she said. "I thought it would be wonderful to live, study and travel in another country."

Ann Joms-Melvin, who received a bachelor's degree in foods and nutrition and pre-medicine, was a 1979 Rhodes scholar.

"I thought I had no chance in the world," Jorns-Melvin said. "My mother told me to apply, and my professor said I should, too."

She studied two years of human sciences, including genetics, social psychology and linguistics, at Oxford.

After returning to the United States, Jorns-Melvin studied at Tulane University and University of California, San Francisco. She is now completing her residency in Seattle, specializing in immunology.

'My work right now is a fellowship with pediatric infectious dis-eases," she said. "It seems like I am at the beginning of my education all over again."

She also works as a medical consultant. Doctors in Washington, Montana, Alaska and Idaho call her for answers about pediatric infectious diseases.

"I may not always know, but I am their link to finding out the answers," she said.

Joms-Melvin said that while she was studying in England, she encountered some of the Oxford students' stereotypes of American students.

"Some were skeptical of you," she said. "I think it was the government, policies and press of the time. They focused on 'Dallas' and 'frogjumping' — what they saw on television. I think they thought Americans were flamboyant, extravagant and less sophisticated.

"I think they changed their stereotypes," she said. "I proved myself ship in 1987. on my own merits."

Jorns-Melvin said that some Rhodes scholars were unhappy because they failed to adapt to life in another culture.

"They were used to the American system and went to the States for every holiday," she said. "They had to adapt, but not every one can (adapt) to new situations. Some felt all cracked up.

Joms-Melvin met her husband, Robin Melvin, during the first day of school at Oxford.

"We ran together in the mornings. That's how we got to know one another," she said. "Mom had said whatever you do, don't fall in love with an Englishman.' But she's come around nicely." Jorns-Melvin said the scholarship has definitely helped her in her career. Most co-workers know she was a Rhodes scholar, she said.

"At the same time, there's internal pressure," she said. "I always think a lot more is expected of me."

Kelly Welch, who received a degree in agricultural economics and economics, won a Rhodes scholar-

Library records K-State history

By Stacle Sanders Collegian Reporter

The University Archives are instrumental in preserving the history of K-State through the collection of documents, photographs and other printed materials.

Anthony R. Crawford, University archivist and curator of manuscripts, was hired as K-State's first archivist almost seven years

"The purpose of the University Archives is to collect, preserve and make available for reference use older, non-current records that we collect from departments on campus,"

Records kept include office records, publications and printed material created by

K-State's administrative offices, departments and organizations; photographic records; maps and drawings of the campus and its buildings; tape recordings of interviews and speeches; papers of alumni; and personal collections.

Crawford said the personal collections are non-University records that have been collected from people who have been active in a field of academic research which is of interest to students and the academic

These include such things as records or files from ranchers and farmers in Kansas, which are of obvious interest to the University and the Department of Agriculture, he

In addition, the University Archives keeps manuscript collections of various individuals, Crawford said.

The archives contain papers of all the K-State presidents except Jon Wefald. Wefald has not been here long enough for his office to transfer his papers because they are still referred to, Crawford said.

The presidents' papers were originally kept in the attic of Anderson Hall, but were moved to the archives and are continuously organized year to year, he said.

Also of great value to the University is the photographic collection, which contains more than 40,000 photographs.

"I'd say the number of photographs has doubled in size over the last five years because offices on campus are cooperating by transferring their photographs here so they'd be available to all researchers on campus and outside campus," Crawford

The photograph collection, which dates from the 1880s, contains pictures of the campus and of Manhattan, he said.

"We really encourage people to come use the archives," he said. "We collect this material, organize it and index it so that students, faculty, staff and researchers from outside around the country can come here and use our materials."

Crawford said students are the primary users of the archives and that the use of the archives has increased steadily.

Group asks for halt in nuclear production

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - A coalition of citizen groups urged the Energy Department on Monday not to produce nuclear weapons materials until it completes a study of how future arms production will affect the environment.

The main nuclear arms production plants have been shut down in recent months for safety and management improvements. But the Energy Department, which owns them, is preparing to announce plans for resuming production by year's end.

Energy Secretary James D. Watkins met with the coalition, the Weapons Production Network, at department headquarters to hear their complaints about a lack of openness.

"Obviously, since there were only 300 blacks on campus then, I had white friends and whites who came out of the woodwork to support me," he said. "I think they did because they knew I was a human being, a person, and that I wasn't going to represent just blacks' point of view."

By the time Franklin was on campus, he said overt racism was rare. "I tell the story of how in the five years I was here, I never had anyone refer to me as a 'nigger' or say anything disrespectful or cause me any discomfort because of my skin color," he said.

Although K-State had some racial problems when he was here, Franklin said, they were not problems that kept him from doing what he wanted

"No one said I couldn't join anything, no one said I wasn't welcome here," he said. "I did it all. I did anything and everything I wanted to because no one said I couldn't.'

Oxford University operates on a system of three eight-week terms during the year, Welch said. This left him 28 weeks out of the year to travel.

'Some students studied a lot during the breaks too, but I just couldn't get myself to do that," he said.

Welch spent one week in the Soviet Union and surrounding areas. He said his time in the Soviet Union changed his perspective on the United States. He cited one particular instance in a grocery store in Kiev.

"It was probably 100 feet long and 10 feet deep," he said. "The entire walls around the room had no fresh fruit or fresh vegetables, and this was in March. It was all in cans.

"A woman walked in and purchased tickets to exchange for some food. She picked up a chicken, turned it over and it was greenish-yellow ... all rotted. But she was happy, and she bought it," he said.

Word that Reed would be released first came Sunday in a statement from a group calling itself the Organization of Islamic Dawn. It released a communique, accompanied by a photograph of Reed, and said the hostage would be freed within 48

ANSWER: The enrollment history of the district and the information available at that time indicated that the district would continue at those current levels as it had not changed in 20 years. In September of 1965 enrollment was 5413. In 1983, the year of the second bond issue, our enrollment was 5459 (plus 46). In 1985, the year the Amanda Arnold school was opened, our enrollment was 5710 (plus 251). In September 1989 our enrollment jumped to 6354 (plus

With the use of computers and new demographic data, we can produce much more sophisticated enrollment projections than we could in the past. We expect the " baby-boom echo" to ripple through the schools even past the year 2000 which will cause the school district to deal with an ever-increasing population.

Protesters spoil Moscow parade

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW - Tens of thousands of protesters in Red Square unleashed their fury at Mikhail Gorbachev Tuesday, turning the traditional May Day parade into an outpouring of complaints about the economy and the blockade of Lithuania.

The Soviet president has allowed free debate in the press and politics and endured public criticism. But never before has he had to personally face such an outburst of discontent over his policies, from both right and

The criticism included jeers to the faces of Soviet leaders.

Gorbachev, 59, tapped his fingers on the parapet of the red granite reviewing stand during the protest, showing his impatience, but otherwise was impassive. He and the other officials left after enduring the unofficial demonstrators for about 20 minutes.

Neither Gorbachev nor any of the other Communist or government leaders on the reviewing stand spoke to the crowd.

Dozens of the demonstrators carried the yellow, red and green national flags of the breakaway Lithuanian republic and shouted "Shame!" and "Freedom For Lithuania!"

Some waved their fists at the leaders, numbering about two dozen, and shouted "Resign!" over the holiday music blaring from loudspeakers.

One caustic sign likened the Soviet leadership to Nicolae Ceausescu, the Romanian dictator executed in December after a popular uprising. "Kremlin Ceausescus: From Armchairs to Prison Beds," it

The leaders clearly expected some criticism. They authorized the unofficial demonstration, and took control of the traditional parade that preceded it from local Communist Party and government officials.

But they likely did not expect the tone to be quite so angry or the scale quite so large.

Gorbachev's popularity has waned during his five years in office because his reforms have failed to resolve chronic economic problems. Many people believe supplies of food, housing and consumer goods actually are worse under Gorbachev.

He also is under fire for the blockade of oil, raw materials and other goods he imposed on Lithuania to force the Baltic republic to back off its March 11 declaration of independence.

For decades, the Red Square rally on May Day has been an orchestrated show of support for official policies. Entry onto Red Square was rigidly controlled. This year, there was little of the usual polite praise. Just about anyone could join the march on the gray cobblestone

Europeans to remove internal trade barriers

By Cosima Hadidi Staff Reporter

pean Economic Community plan to unified European currency. remove their internal trade barriers by the end of 1992 to ease the movement of services, capital, goods and people between them.

For some, it is a significant step toward resolving problems that have been plagued Europe for centuries.

"Nationalism has been the major cause of wars in Europe," said John Daly, assistant professor of history. "Economic integration is a fairly hopeful sign toward the elimination of nationalism." With 323 million consumers, the market resulting from economic integration would be one of the richest in the world. But the integration of 12 nations with very different backgrounds is an immense task. The plan that would take effect in 1992 consists of 279 proposals and is only the

"We are talking about a nation has over a thousand years of historic self-awareness and which has made symbolic decisions such as not going metric to maintain its sense of separation from the rest of Europe," Daly

Another issue to contend with is the economic difference of the Western European north and south. The South, including Greece, Spain and Portugal, has a generally lower average income than the North. Integration would produce hardships if a quota were to be set on the amount of farm production, Daly said.

"Food mountains are generated, such as a raisin mountain in Greece. Taking farmers out of production is not a popular idea there," he said.

Joseph Hajda, professor of political science, said the economic integize their foreign policies," he said. "What is taking place now can be seen as a dedicating effort towards a common European foreign policy some time in the future.

Haida said the 12 member states currently arrive at common foreign policies only on occasion and often after difficult disputes. "Recently they have reached a consensus with increasing frequency," he said. "All this has important implications for U.S.-European relations, East-West relations and every aspect of international relations. The political institutions in Europe are changing. Hajda said some institutions common to the member countries will increase in importance, even though there is no indication that a political union will result soon. Because the result of the economic

"The member states of the Euro- reform will be a very strong market, pean Economic Community have ta- other European countries will probken steps to coordinate and harmon- ably join, Hajda said. Austria and Turkey have already applied, but their applications will not be considered before the end of 1992, he said.

"Other countries, particularly newly reformed central and eastern European countries such as Czechoslovakia, Poland and Hungary, will be working out some kind of association with the European community," Hajda said.

Wayne Nafziger, professor of economics, said the implications of a larger integrated European market to United States are not easy to forecast but could be quite favorable.

"The important point is whether the integration will be accompanied by greater protections in the form of tariffs, taxes and international trade restrictions, or if it will stay the same," Nafziger said. "There is also the question of protection against foreign investment.

"The European market is especially sensitive to Japanese investments, particularly in the automobile market. Italy and France will probably continue to restrain Japanese imports, and this may be the tendency toward the U.S. as well."

The ideal for the European community would be not to increase restrictions, despite temptations to do

"The U.S. is not completely innocent in this. It has raised its trade barriers against its European trading partners," Nafziger said. "This could cause a small trade conflict which would result in the United States being hurt by Europe's trade unification."

However, increasing trade barriers usually backfires.

"If a country tries to rectify its problem of slow economic growth by diverting income from foreign to domestic citizens, it reduces sufficiency and causes retaliation by the trading partners making a bad situation worse," Nafziger said.

The possible integration of Eastem Europe into the European Economic Community could be of a substantial benefit to the United States because it will enlarge its exports market. But an attempt to integrate Eastern Europe could make the whole process of integration more difficult, Nafziger said.

"Eastern European countries don't play by the same monetary rules that Western countries and Japan go by," he said. "They do not allow free purchase of currency, and their currency is essentially of no value outside their own country. Therefore it is not easy to integrate western and eastern European economies.

"It would be very difficult to establish rules that will be satisfactory to both parties."

Minority groups remain outsiders

African-American organizations provide sense of belonging

By Tomari Quinn Staff Reporter Julie Andsager Features Editor

Members of a minority may feel less a part of the University because they are greatly outnumbered by the majority group on campus.

Organizations such as the Black Student Union and the African-American greek system give African-American students a sense of belonging.

"These are institutions of selfrealization, if you like, sometimes the first time black students are able to come together in self-supporting groups," said Thomas Mackey, assistant professor in history. "It's a very rewarding experience. It's not a question of exclusion.

"For many of them, it's the first time they feel included in anything." The African-American groups allow students with similar experiences and backgrounds to assist others in the transition to the University environment.

'As with any fraternal group it gives a person someone to relate to

- someone that you can go to," said Greg Williams, junior in chemical engineering. "Groups are primarily formed because of the need for relationships.'

Finding other students with common goals and backgrounds is important for a sense of stability, especially for incoming students, Williams said. Most of the African-American students grew up in predominantly African-American neighborhoods.

"It's a shock for any of us coming from a small town in Kansas (to come to K-State)," said Bernard Franklin, 1976 student body president. "It's a big difference. You want to hang with people like you so you can make the transition into college life easier."

"When I go to class, I'm in a class with 250 whites," said William Coleman, sophomore in electrical engineering. "When I sit down (at the Union), I just want to be with my people. If you forget where you were at, you're going to forget where you're going. Franklin said people with similarities tend to gather in groups, but it may be more obvious for the African-American students.

"If you go in the cafeteria, sorority sisters sit together. Fraternity men sit together," he said. "But what we see is the color issue. We say, 'Wow, why do colored people need to be

A healthy African-American community is created when the students have strong organizational ties, Mackey said.

Marcus Miller, senior in social science and social work, said African-American fraternities and sororities on campus bring people in that group closer together.

"There aren't that many minorities on this campus and by being in that group it makes you feel like you have someone close to you," Miller said. "It's like a family."

African-American students often struggle to find a sense of identity and belonging in a culturally different environment, said the Rev. Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities at K-State.

"It's hard for majority groups to recognize (minority) need for identity," Fallon said. "There is a kind of exclusiveness and a separation that has been happening."

Franklin said that although K-

State is far ahead of many other universities, segregation still exists in areas where African-Americans grow up with African-Americans and whites grow up with whites. "I think people don't have enough interaction by the time they get to colleges and universities that this polarization exists," Franklin said. "So people don't understand why there is a black student union.'

Anne Butler, associate with Educational Support Services, helped to organize an African-American student collective at a college in Kentucky in the mid-1960s. The purpose was to address concerns and issues unique to African-Americans.

She said even though significant changes have occurred in society, organizations such as BSU are still

'We'd like to think the institution (K-State) is fully accessible to every student, but there are a lot of informal roles and statuses that black students or minority students in general don't have access to," Butler said.

"Minorities are newcomers to the institution," she said. "They are the last people to arrive, and you'd think they would be welcome. They can co-exist here, but they are not invited into the inner room.

Because the minority groups are not invited into the mainstream, they often segregate themselves from the majority group.

"If black students or Hispanic students or Oriental students had more in common with the majority of the students, then there probably wouldn't be any need for those types of organizations," Williams said.

Bar owners divided on bottle recycling

By Tammy Breitenbach Collegian Reporter

Manhattan bar owners are divided on whether it is worth the effort to recycle their bottles and Snookies bar in Aggieville buys thinner, nonreturnable bottles from the distributor and throws them away mainly because of convenience, said Ken Snook, co-owner of Snookies.

"I worked for bars when there were only returnables," Snook said. "But then they started making both kinds. If the distributor would run out of returnables, they would send us nonreturnables. We'd get them mixed up in the case, and (the distributors) would complain. It just got to be where it was easier to say I want all nonreturnables because everyone's going that way."

On nights when Snookies goes through 20 to 30 cases of bottled beer, there is no room to store the bottles for recycling, said Keith Eyestone, co-owner of Snookies.

Other bars in town I know go through 80 cases a day," Eyestone said. "To store 80 cases of bottles someplace gets to be a hassle, especially if the distributor doesn't pick them up on time. That's the reason we throw them away during the night. We can always go out to the dumpster."

James Schlickau, co-owner of ney from recycling.

Charlie's Neighborhood Bar, said he buys returnable bottles from the distributor. Used bottles are picked up when the new ones are dropped off.

'I don't handle them at all," Schlickau said. "I just get a deposit and so much off (the next case) if I return them. I think it's like a nickel a bottle or about a dollar a case that I get back."

Both bottles and cans are recycled at Rusty's Last Chance, said owner Rusty Wilson. The money is put back into the business. Wilson said recycling the bottles is a hassle sometimes, but the bar still takes advantage of it.

"You have to figure as many bottles as we have over a year's time, the money that we get back starts to add up," he said. "We saved all of our bottle money one time and took all of our employees to a Royals game."

Chris Clowers, dining room manager of Hibachi Hut and Lone Star Cafe, said they do not save recycleable bottles, but set aside a box for their employees who want to recycle the bottles and keep the

Battle rages in Ethiopia

MASSAWA, Ethiopia (AP) - Day and night, heavy artillery and tank barrages thunder along a 90-mile front, in what might be the decisive battle of the nearly 30-year-old Eritrean civil war, Africa's longest-running conflict.

The battle raging between Ethiopian government troops and Eritrean rebels in Ethiopia's northernmost province is possibly the most destructive conflict in the world today, resulting in thousands of casualties on both sides.

The rebels appear to have the upper hand in the fighting along what is called the Ghinda front. So fierce are the artillery and tank exchanges that their distant rumble can be heard clearly in the strategic Red Sea port of Massawa, about 37 miles away.

Massawa, now in rebel hands, was the target of six Ethiopian air raids in April by Soviet-built MiG fighters. Rebel spokesmen say at least 110 people, many of them civilians, have been killed in the cluster bomb attacks.

The antagonists in the fight are the Marxist government of President Mengistu Haile Mariam and rebel forces dominated by the Eritrean People's Liberation Front, which seek independence for the province of 3.5 million people. The Eritrean Front is considered left-leaning, but its leaders say they reject any political identification tag.

The government forces' immediate objective is to recapture Massawa, one of only two Ethiopian Red Sea harbors that have traditionally handled most of the country's trade and international relief supplies for millions of famine victims.

The port was captured by the Eritreans on Feb. 11, three days after they launched a major new offensive in their 29-year-old war of secession.

The rebels have their sights set on a bigger objective — the capture of their ancient, hallowed provincial capital of Asmara and the end to a conflict that has claimed hundreds of thousands of lives.

Weapons reactors to reopen

WASHINGTON (AP) - The government intends to restart in December the first of three nuclear weapons reactors shut down for two years over safety concerns, Energy Secretary James Watkins said Tuesday in announcing resumed production for the nation's atomic arsenal.

Watkins said the Energy Department also is looking at resuming in June and July the production of atomic warheads at its Rocky Flats plant in Colorado, where operations were suspended last November because of similar safety and environmental concerns.

The department plans to restart its K reactor at the Savannah River plant in South Carolina in December and, after a period of low-power testing, begin producing tritium for nuclear weapons in January, Watkins said.. The P and L reactors at Savannah River would be restarted in March and September of 1991, respectively, Watkins told a subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee. He said facilities at the Rocky Flats plant, shut down since last November over concerns about safety, would reopen this summer under a plan submitted by the operating contractor at

However, he said that plan has "not yet been approved by DOE" and that he does not intend to formally announce a resumption of operations at Rocky Flats for another month.

"At this time, there does not seem to be any alternative for the nation other than keeping Rocky Flats on line to deal with warhead management," Watkins said.

Leaders to push for rollback

TOPEKA (AP) - Republican legislative leaders agreed Tuesday night to make one more major effort on Wednesday to pass a property tax rollback bill tied to an increase in the cigarette and tobacco products tax.

Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr said a House-Senate conference committee would attempt early Wednesday to reach agreement on a bill combining those two proposals, and that agreement would be taken up by mid-day in the Senate.

If it is accepted, it would go to the House and approval there would send it to Gov. Mike Hayden who continued Tuesday to press lawmakers to pass a property tax relief measure before concluding its wrap-up session.

Kerr predicted the conference committee would agree on a proposal that would raise the state sales tax by one-half cent on the dollar, from 4.25 percent to 4.75 percent, and raise the tax on cigarettes by 5 cents a pack and on other tobacco products by 5 percent.

Those items would generate about $118 million in new revenue, enough to roll back school property taxes by about 16 percent. Kerr said it also was possible the conference committee might agree to repeal a few sales tax exemptions as well, producing a little more revenue for property tax relief.

Murder charges filed in case

KANSAS CITY, Kan. (AP) - An adult and a juvenile were charged Tuesday in the murder of a teen-age mother who was killed as she waited for her boyfriend in a grocery store parking lot.

Jerrell Edward Larry, 24, of Kansas City, Kan., was charged with first-degree murder and aggravated robbery in Wyandotte County District Court, said Mike Grosko, assistant district attorney.

The juvenile, James Poole Jr., 17, also of Kansas City, Kan., was charged with the same offenses in juvenile court, Grosko said. Prosecutors will begin proceedings on Wednesday to have Poole certified to stand trial as an adult.

Sara Foulk, 17, was shot to death about 1 a.m. Saturday as she sat in her car with her 4-month-old son. She was waiting outside the Price Chopper store for her boyfriend, Sean Malloy, who had stopped to buy milk and cigarettes.

"It appears it was just a random senseless killing," said Detective Rick Pilgrim of the Kansas City, Mo., police. The metro squad, which includes officers from different cities in the metropolitan area, began investigating the murder Monday.

"The victim was at the wrong place at the right time, and it appears they wanted the car mainly," Pilgrim said.

Foulk was waiting in the car when she was shot. When Malloy came out of the store, he found Foulk on the ground and the car and their son, Vincent Malloy, gone.

The baby was found uninjured on the front porch of an abandoned house about 30 minutes later, and the car was recovered about 4 a.m. Saturday, police said.

Man innocent by insanity

ABILENE (AP) - An Abilene man was found not guilty by reason of insanity Tuesday in the October 1989 shooting death of his ex-wife's boyfriend.

Johnnie Turnbow Jr., 47, had been charged with first-degree murder and attempted murder for shooting into a car where his ex-wife, Shirley Turnbow, was sitting with her boyfriend, Richard Allen.

Reed reunites with wife, son

Malnourished ex-hostage celebrates long-awaited freedom with beer, steak

By The Associated Press WIESBADEN, West Germany — Frank Reed, malnourished but energetic after his 31/2 -year ordeal as a hostage in Lebanon, celebrated his freedom Tuesday with a beer, a large steak and a long-awaited reunion with his wife and son.

A special State Department team began questioning the 57-year-old educator at the U.S. Air Force hospital in Wiesbaden, hoping for clues about the 16 remaining Western hostages in Lebanon. Six American hostages are still held.

Reed, who said he spent much of his captivity blindfolded, is the second American hostage freed since April 22.

In Malden, Mass., Reed's daughter said he told her he had been held with American hostages Terry Anderson and Thomas Sutherland but was separated from them about a year ago. Anderson and Sutherland are among the six remaining U.S. hostages in Lebanon.

'He was disturbed that they weren't out. He thought for sure they would have been released," said Marilyn Langston, 33. She said Reed called her early Tuesday from the military hospital in West Germany. Langston said her father said he lost 60 pounds during his 43 months in captivity.

After performing some preliminary medical examinations, including X-rays and blood tests, Reed's doctors said the former captive showed no initial signs of serious medical problems.

Reed lost "significant weight and muscle mass from a lack of exercise and a marginal diet" during his 43 months in captivity, the doctors said in a statement released by the

They added that Reed is weak and tired, but "otherwise feels well and is talking with family and medical staff." The hospital said Reed had indicated he did not want to meet with the media Tuesday. Reed was reunited at the hospital Tuesday morning with his Syrian Moslem wife, Fahima, 39, and their 9-year-old son, Tarek, who had arrived from the United States, where they had been staying in his hometown of Malden, Mass.

Military officials said Reed's wife and son went on a quick shopping tour to buy new clothes for him at the nearby U.S. Lindsey Air Base.

Reed displayed a healthy appetite and a strong thirst for beer, according to the hospital staff.

For lunch, Reed requested a "Heineken (beer) and a large steak cooked medium rare," and the freed hostage "got what he asked for," the hospital statement said.

He spent the afternoon sleeping and was to have dinner with his family, hospital officials said.

In Washington, President Bush called Reed's release joyous news, but said he wouldn't be satisifed until all the remaining hostages are freed.

Bush, who met at the White House Tuesday with Democratic and Republican leaders, praised Syria and Iran for exerting pressure on the Shiite Moslem fundamentalist hostage-

But the president also prodded the two countries to work for the release of more hostages, emphasizing they should not expect normal relations or vast improvement until all Americans are freed.

"When a step is taken that goes toward that day when all hostages are released, I should say thank you," Bush said. "But beyond that, I can't say that I can be happy."

Terry Anderson, one of the six remaining American hostages, is the longest-held Western hostage in Lebanon. Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press, was abducted March 16, 1985.

Bush said he would not object if Israel were to release Shiite prisoners as the Lebanese hostage-takers have Israeli officials, reacting to the indirect U.S. appeal, insisted that Israel wanted three Israeli soldiers captured in Lebanon in 1986 to be part of any deal. The three are believed held by radical Shiites linked to the pro-Iranian Hezbollah militia.

A leading Iranian newspaper, the Tehran Times, said Tuesday that Iran's leaders expect a reciprocal gesture of good will from Washington if another U.S. hostage is to be

Property appraisals inaccurate

Different interpretations of wording, computer cause valuation increases

By Erica Yenni Collegian Reporter

Different interpretations of physical property appraisal reviews and an error in computer programming caused substantial valuation increases in at least 9,000 Riley County residents' properties.

Sam Schmidt, county appraiser, said the interpretation by the Legislature was that a property had to be physically visited, but the county appraisers thought a visual review constituted a physical review.

Schmidt said only new construction, properties that were individually reviewed in the appeals process and agricultural property should have been subject to the 1990 reappraisal. However, he said, an improper definition of the word "reviewed" was used by county officials in preparing the 1990 notices.

"It was my interpretation, and it was wrong, because I shouldn't have read into a law things that weren't there," Schmidt said.

Schmidt said a one-year moratorium decreed by the Legislature should have prevented many of the notices from being sent. But he said inadequate guidance from state officials resulted in valuation notices being sent to owners of properties covered by the moratorium.

A total moratorium on reappraisals would have been easier to administer, Schmidt said.

"It's always easier to do something totally rather than partially, because there are no conflicts," he said. "Now we need to get this behind us and get ready for 1990." Schmidt said the 1990 values were built using a market modeling computer program designed to appraise neighborhood and market properties which were not physically reviewed.

Schmidt said something was amiss in the programming of the computer, causing it to assign incorrect values.

Men and women not opposing teams

like men and I am too happy to study. But men can be butt-heads. I can sit still and study if I want to. But I don't want to, and I like men.

I am really tired of male-bashing. It's just as bad as bush-wacking. As a woman, I am supposed to feel angry, and I am angry. Yet, I feel that anger without direction or intention, aimed at males as if they all share the same universal qualities, only perpetuates, even accentuates, the stereotypes and our differences. This is just as oppressive as cat-calls, as a grab of ass. I don't want to assume that each man is going to assume I am a lamb

I know this male and he is scared of what would happen when and if women actually become powerful and over-powering. I wept that night after he expressed his fears, his momentary deluge of vulnerability. Many women would say, "Good, let him feel what it feels to be threatened and frightened." I say, "Yes, it is good to step inside someone's skin, especially a skin that might fit too tight, or be a different color." But my friend saw a vision of hatred, of women taking revenge. This is most disturbing. This is not the goal. I know this other male and he is shedding layer after layer of his "callous man" as quickly as he can bear this metamorphosis. His skin is pink and tender, and easily torn. He hurts as he remembers how he treated others and himself. He wants to be an individual and not part of a species locked into aggression, testosterone, and empty thrusts. This male fears the future without change. He sees his own doom in his sex, his gender.

I know this other male and he tried to imagine what it would be like to be a woman. He almost suffocated. He was afraid to leave his house, afraid to trust. I patted him on the head and said, "Good girl, you are really trying hard, aren't you?" He flushed and carried humiliation around in his soul.

I know this other male and he is graduating this spring. He is angry and keeps swatting the walls with newspapers. He is sad and can't sit still inside his room without knowing he will go insane. Now that the end has come and he is to head out into the world, he is heavy and does not feel light. He does not feel like taking the customary jump from the nest as all male birds are expected to do. He wants to know intimacy, to feel connected, but the realm of feelings is associated only with pain, disappointment and anger. I held his hand. I wondered how long he had been without touch, for touch is not productive, and definitely will not provide an income.

I know this other male. He can't find one bright male to befriend. Whenever males get together, the result is an exaggeration, and communication is prevented except when it comes to jokes like: "Yea, I know what Women's Studies is. I do that all the time."

So I like some men. Men are good and bad aren't we all good and bad? But it seems that American women, as reported by a Roper Organization poll, increasingly believe that "men are mean, manipulative, oversexed, self-centered, and lazy." Yet, the poll also found that "men must have some redeeming factors: nine out of 10 women said marriage is better than living alone.

And as Cosmopolitan's editor, Helen Gurley Brown, admits: "Cosmo's a little rich on how to please a man, but that's because we want one. There are not enough men to go around! When there are five eligible men for every woman, I'll certainly change the tune of Cosmo ... until then, men are the only sex we have." We women sound like greedy little creatures, don't we? Well, I think this woman is deranged. But nevertheless, women can be just as thoughtless and base. Especially if we take magazines like Cosmo seriously.

Guess what we women learn from such "Gurley magazines"? We learn how to "rouge our knees, refresh our feet, how to trap a man, how to feed a man, how to make love to a man, how to find another man." Women who believe this stuff are assuming that all men are the same, that one man is no different from the other, and that men want to be catered to. Do they want that or do we women assume this to be our role? Do we assume that it is necessary for the preservation of relationships?

Cosmo teaches women to be what men are taught to want in women.

each other. I like men and women. I like it when we are honest. And I am honestly angry at women who perpetuate the status-quo themselves. I am honestly angry at women who insist that men are all infested. Wouldn't it be better if women and men worked together on this project - that mistakes be made and forgiven? I do not excuse the violence, the pain and destruction of human life, usually woman life. But I do hope that women's anger can be expressed constructively.

For the men and women who want change, we need to thank them and listen to them for they are brave. But for those who find it safe to separate, men assuming a superior attitude over women, and women assuming a similar stance concerning men, I feel sadness and frustration for these individuals.

Sex can be seen as another variation in our biological compositions. And gender can be seen as a constructed, exaggerated variation, that differentiates and pits women and men against each other. I wish we could see each other, deal with each other more as worthy and responsible individuals, than as members of two groups, as opposing teams.

Legalize tailgating

Whenever alcohol is mentioned there is always a response. There are always aberrations when it comes to alcohol. Whenever 1 think of alcohol, I think of responsibility. The Wildcats have had a history of marginal success at football and there definitely needs to be something done to increase the performance on the field. One measure that has already been taken was the hiring of Bill Snyder from Iowa. Snyder is a very competent coach. Another way we could improve our team is by recruitment. When an impressionable high school senior or junior college transfer comes to watch a K-State football game, he not only watches the players but the excitement that the fans have and the general atmosphere of the stadium. Legalizing tailgating and/or beer sales at the stadium would more than likely draw more student participation which would lead to more crowd involvement in the game.

Other peer institutions, such as Colorado, have legal tailgating and beer sales at their football games and have met with success. I think that with a few rules - no kegs or bottles, allowing only cans (which can be recycled) - could also set a precedent for other universities to follow and would augment the athletic budget, creating a sort of reciprocity for allowing tailgating. Alcohol is an opportunity for K-State and not something that should be treated as a detriment to the success

Violence must end

Expect violence to increase in South Africa. Despite calls for negotiations and significant government reform aimed toward abolishing Apartheid, many South African blacks are determined to intensify the wave of violence already sweeping the country.

Ironically, the violence is not aimed at the white minority government but instead at other black individuals and organizations. Black against black violence has reached an all-time high in South Africa with no apparent end in sight.

Nelson Mandela's plea for peace in Natal, for example, fell upon deaf ears because Mandela himself refuses to give up "the armed struggle." If black South Africa leaders condone the use of violence as a means by which to secure national power, how can they not expect their followers to use the same methods to establish regional or tribal dominance? If peace is to finally come to South Africa, it will be necessary for black South Africa leaders to renounce all acts of violence and political intimidation. Unfortunately, this is something they are not yet willing or able to

IN FOCUS

The president's house at 100 Wilson Court has been home to President Jon Wefald, his wife, Ruth Ann, and their family since July of 1986. It was built about 1923.

A Place of Elegance

Popcorn and Toughy, the Wefald poodles, wrestled on the caramelcolored carpet at 100 Wilson Court, as Ruth Ann Wefald met a photographer.

"I'm only prepared for you to take pictures on the first floor, and the kitchen is typically kind of a mess, so I hope that's all right," she said. Besides being the site of numerous public receptions and dinners, the house, built in 1923, serves as home to the Wefald family.

Jon and Ruth Ann Wefald, along with their sons, Skipp and Andy, moved into Wilson Court in July 1986, when Jon became president of the University.

Wefald said some remodeling was needed. She and Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning, worked with a fund set up by outgoing president. Duene Asker, to receive and point the home's interior.

ident Duane Acker, to recarpet and paint the home's interior.

"The Ackers had lived here for 11 years and they had done a lot of entertaining," she said. "You can imagine 11 years of very hard entertaining. It takes a toll on the house."

Wefald said she kept the K-State Art Collection in mind as she and Garvin redecorated. The walls and carpets are light-colored, which she said helps show off the artwork.

"One of the things I've tried to do in the home is bring in some of the K-State Art Collection," Wefald said. "I like to show off the work of the K-State artists and show off what is in the collection because I'm trying to raise money for an art museum for Kansas State. I think it's helpful to have some of the collection in the president's home."

The collection includes work by Pablo Picasso, Norman Rockwell, Gordon Parks and many others. Paintings completed by members of the K-State art department are also displayed in the house.

"People like to look at art, and they'll ask about it as they sit here eating dinner," Wefald said. "It's a way of showcasing it."

She said there is a steady stream of visitors to the house.

"Sometimes the house is used three or four times a week for entertaining," Wefald said. "Other times it's only once a week. The house gets

In 1986, both Skipp and Andy moved into the house with their parents, however Skipp now lives in his fraternity house.

"Skipp still comes by," Wefald said. "In fact, he's upstairs right now.

I think he sees it as kind of a quiet haven to read a book or study — kind of a place to get away a little bit.

"He brings home his dirty laundry," she laughed. "You wouldn't believe the laundry."

The second floor of the house is the family's private living quarters, and the third floor is a two-bedroom guest facility. Past University presidents have used the third floor as quarters for servants.

guests at Wilson Court have included visiting lecturers, legislators, professors, regents and commencement speakers, Wefald said. Even a future president of the United States stayed there when his brother was president of the University.

"Where Andy's bedroom is, was a guest bedroom, and that's where General Eisenhower stayed during World War II when he visited here," she said. "So Andy likes that — he's staying in General Eisenhower's room."

In 1979, former University president James McCain wrote a composition about living at Wilson Court, which is stored in University Archives. According to McCain, Truman Capote stayed at the house while researching his book "In Cold Blood," which was published in 1965. It was the account of the murder of a family in Holcomb, some of whom were K-State graduates.

Although Capote's visit was longterm, Wefald said overnight guests are not common.

About 150 people for stand-up events and 80 can be seated for meals. Besides the formal dining room, all the furnishings at Wilson Court belong to the Wefalds. In the University-owned china cabinet, the Wefald's own china is mixed with the University's set.

The basement of the Wefald home has a second kitchen, used mainly for storage, and a recreation room with a pool table.

"The University utilities people made me a nice plywood piece that I can put over our pool table, then drape it and put on a nice floral arrangement, and you can have cocktails downstairs," Wefald said. "It's a way of utilizing all the space we have in the house, so we can get more people in. People like to come to the president's house.

"There's something about coming to the president's house that's very special. And of course it is a lovely home. We love living here. It's a beautiful, beautiful home."

Despite the large number of visitors, Wefald said Wilson Court feels like a home.

"When you move all your things into a home, it feels like your home," she said. "And we don't have live-in help, so when all the guests are gone, it's quiet and we're the only ones here. Then it's our home again."

Ruth Ann uses their personal furnishings in most of the house.

'Cats look to avenge defeat at WSU

Mike Venso/File

K-State coach Mike Clark and Wichita State's Gene Stephenson will match wits again tonight as the Wildcats travel to Eck Stadium for a 7 p.m. matchup with the Shockers. WSU defeated the Wildcats, 8-5, last Thursday before the biggest crowd to ever watch a college baseball game in Kansas, at 6,155 fans. Some Wichita faithful were apparently upset with last Thursday's crowd estimate and will try to break the record again tonight.

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

With a renewed sense of focus, the Wildcat baseball team will travel to Wichita for a 7 p.m. contest with the defending national champion Wichita State Shockers.

WSU handed K-State an 8-5 defeat April 26 at Frank Myers Field, reaching Wildcat pitching ace David Hierholzer for seven runs in the first inning.

Since that date, the Wildcats have swept Northern Colorado in a threegame weekend series and dropped both ends of a doubleheader Monday against Southwest Missouri

In the home losses against SMSU, K-State coach Mike Clark said he saw a few things happening that he wasn't particularly pleased

Thus, a heart-to-heart meeting between the coaching staff and the team took place Tuesday prior to practice. Though the 'Cats are 27-20 overall and second in the Big Eight with a 10-6 mark, Clark said the players needed to be reminded of a few things.

"What we did (Tuesday) was just a process of making sure that everyone was focused goal- and attitudewise," Clark said. "It really hit home. We had an open forum afterward to let the guys say what they wanted, and as a result the guys are closer to one another again.'

Clark said a lack of team unity is possible, even 47 games into a year, when a team has been together for five games in a period of just under

"The kids were tired, and they had a right to be tired," Clark said. "The season can get long and it can get drawn out, and sometimes you need a break from each other, and you need to remind everyone of what you've worked so long and hard to get accomplished."

And in tonight's contest against the Shockers, K-State will make several moves Clark hopes will put the Wildcats in a position to accomplish one major goal - making a trip to Oklahoma City and the Big Eight Postseason Tournament.

Intent on keeping his pitching rotation in order for a key weekend series against Nebraska in Lincoln, Clark will send sophomore righthander Mike Dunaway to the mound to open the WSU game. He'll likely be followed to the hill, Clark said, by Wade Anderson and Pat Boyle.

Boyle is a graduate of Wichita's Southeast High School and played summer baseball for the Wichita Stars, an entry in the Connie Mack League that participated in the Connie Mack World Series.

The names aren't familiar to the casual K-State fan, but Clark is confident the trio can do the job.

"We just want to compete hard and get ready for the weekend," he said. "We're going to try to take as much pressure off the three of them as we can. And we look at it as an opportunity for them.

We're still not set as to our final 24 (players) if we qualify for the tournament, and we expect they'll compete hard for a chance to be fans. Last Thursday, when No. 8 Wichita State came to town, 6,155 of you came to Frank Myers Field, enjoyed hot dogs, pop, contraband alcohol and a heckuva baseball game. In the process, you sent K-State athletic director Steve Miller to the bank with a big smile on his face, and you probably made the 'Cat baseball team feel pretty damned

But you also ticked those Shocker fans off big time.

Tonight, K-State travels down the interstate for a rematch with the defending national champions. However, the real war may be at the Eck Stadium ticket booth, where WSU fans will undoubtedly be fighting to get in and regain what used to be theirs.

You see, by coming out to the ballpark last week, you took away the Shocks' title of having the largest college baseball crowd ever to see a game in Kansas. Thursday's figure exceeded the previous high of 5.510 set April 27, 1989, when the Shockers played host to Oklahoma other ... let's say 6,154 ... who ap-

On his sports talk show this week, Mike Kennedy questioned the attendance figure, saying he went as far as to count the number of bleachers at Frank Myers Field, and multiply it by the number of seats in each bleacher.

Right after the announcement was made Thursday, a disgruntled Shocker supporter turned to the press box and demanded a recount. The tone of his voice challenged the plauded themselves for being a part Isn't it a shame the attendance rechita State fan at a baseball game?

To be fair to the WSU faithful, I investigated how an attendance figure is determined. Assistant sports information director Kevin Klintworth told me Thursday's number was determined through a combined effort of Miller, ticket manager Carol Adolph, sports information director Kenny Mossman and himself.

"We had no idea that there would be that many people at the game," Klintworth said. "Setting a record never crossed anybody's mind. I think it's a compliment to Wichita State as much as anything."

Exactly. And maybe even more important, a compliment to the strides college baseball has made in the Sunflower State. Admittedly, last week's crowd was aided by promotions from a local radio station and service

Tailgate parties, sorority functions and the fact that it was the Shockers helped out, too. For anybody who actually saw the crowd, you know how hard it would have been to hit the number on the head. "There were a lot of people there even before our ticket people got things set up," Klintworth said. "A lot of people got in for free, and people were just everywhere. With a crowd like that, you have to go so much by sight.'

Saberhagen dropped to 1-3 and gave up a career-high 13 hits before departing after the sixth.

Dan Plesac relieved Chuck Crim with two runners on base in the Kansas City ninth. Pinch hitter Pat Tabler singled home a run before Plesac got his third save.

Higuera was handed a 4-0 lead in the first inning, but George Brett's two-run single capped a three-run rally in the second by the Royals.

Top Cat program helps sell football tickets

By Tammy Breitenbach Collegian Reporter

The athletic department has initiated a new method of selling football tickets this spring that officials say has already been getting results. The new medium is a select group of students, called Top Cats, who have been hired by the athletic department to sell tickets on a face to face basis. "We hope that the Top Cats can cover the student body better than we can through advertising," said Dave Ebberts, assistant director of marketing and sales for the athletic

'You may have people who are on the fence as far as buying a ticket goes and if they get a call from somebody or speak to somebody face to face who is excited about our program and is knowledgeable about ticket options, it might push them over the edge and make them want to buy a ticket."

This is a pilot program that was instituted last year with alumni groups around the state of Kansas, said Chris Peterson, assistant athletic director.

"I feel we have a very strong supporting cast in our student body, with our athletic program, and feel they should have the opportunity to get involved also," Peterson said, "because you, as a student, can talk another student into attending an event much easier than an administrator can."

Ebberts said the main attraction of buying from a Top Cat is that payment will be deferred and added to the student's tuition next fall provided that they are pre-enrolled. Tickets must be picked up at the ticket office by Sept. 6, and a valid fee receipt must be presented to the

"What my thinking would be is are definitely an impact."

'what's another $42 when I'm already paying $800', you wouldn't even notice it," he said.

Peterson said the Top Cats can solicit anyone, not just living groups. As of Monday morning, student ticket sales have tripled compared to this time last year, he said.

"It is due, I feel, because of the better quality football program," Peterson said, "which I think is pretty common knowledge due to the kind of job Coach Snyder and his people are doing, and I think the students are feeling good about it. The Top Cats

Light-hearted film provides diversion

'Earth Girls Are Easy' frothy, funny without lack of depth in winning cinema effort

The end of the semester brings tensions and anxieties of all kinds. With respect to the cinema, some type of diversion, not too taxing yet not too moronic, would be a welcome relief. "Earth Girls Are Easy" is that perfect diversion.

The film wraps up a diverse and challenging Kaleidoscope Films season. Any film series that can shift gears from the manic surrealism of 'Women on the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown" to the involving and controversial "Last Temptation of kitschy, B-movie tribute like "Earth ribly involved with his part, but, in-Girls Are Easy."

The movie is a lighthearted and slightly silly parody. To the film's credit, it manages to be frothy and funny without being devoid of depth. All of the elements in "Earth Girls Are Easy" combine cohesively to make it a winning effort.

The film's plot is relatively simple. A beautician from Calfornia, played by Geena Davis, splits with her two-timing fiance. Shortly thereafter, a spaceship lands in her pool. She befriends the aliens who, after some quick depilatory work, turn out to be irresistible to every girl they meet, including Davis.

Jeff Goldblum, who has an eclectic criteria for choosing film roles, plays the leader of the aliens. Goldblum's alien is full of wit and urbane sophistication unlike his compat-terestingly enough, that does not seem to detract from "Earth Girls Are

Perhaps the oddest feature of the film is the fact that MTV cult figure Julie Brown (of "Just Say Julie") is the backbone of "Earth Girls Are Easy." In addition to her acting and singing roles in the film, she also cowrote the screenplay with two Originally, the movie was designed as a vehicle for Brown. When Goldblum and Davis were signed as a tandem, Brown wisely deferred. Although the blond-bashing redhead is quite talented and humorous, she suffers from a grating screen presence. A starring role for Julie Brown may be too much to handle.

Brown steals the scenes in which she appears. Her musical interlude of "'Cause I'm A Blonde' (B-L-A-N-D)" is hysterical even though it is extraneous.

The two other aliens who land in Davis' pool are played like E.T.'s on designer drugs by Damon Wayans and Jim Carrey. The two men (who can currently be found on the Fox network's "In Living Color") are responsible for the majority of comic moments that occur outside of Goldblum and Davis' romantic interludes. The rubber-faced Wayans stands out in particular thanks to his impeccable comic timing and slick dancing.

A major distinction of "Earth Girls Are Easy" is its pseudo-musical approach. Actual production numbers and stylized rock video sequences populate the film.

One explanation is the fact that the movie is filled with MTV connections. Brown, of course, is an MTV personality and the pulsing soundtrack features tracks by Depeche Mode and the B-52's. The main reason for the video imagery, however, stems from director Julien Temple.

Temple has finally made the transition from short-form video to the big screen. Previously best known for his work on David Bowie promos, Temple fell flat with his first major cinematic effort, "Absolute Beginners," an empty interpretation of a Colin MacInnes novel.

The director has managed to combine the style of videos with talent sufficient to make "Earth Girls Are Easy" enjoyable. Many of Temple's peers have failed in making this transition, but "Earth Girls" vindicates him.

"Earth Girls Are Easy" will be shown at 7 p.m. today in Forum Hall, 3:30 p.m. Thursday in Little Theatre and 7 p.m. Thursday in Forum Hall. Admission is $1.75.

Students join community in new Rotary Club

By Erica Yenni Collegian Reporter

Students and Manhattan residents can now join together to develop leadership and professional skills through community and international service in a new club sponsored by the Manhattan Rotary Club.

The club, called Rotaract, is for anyone ages 18 to 29 who is interested in community service and in advancing the cause of international understanding and peace, said Darrell Brensing, chairman of special projects for the Rotary

"It's an international organization with some worthy goals and it's something the Manhattan Rotary Club is proud to sponsor," said Brensing, who is also vice president of education at the American Institute of Baking.

Rotaract was founded in 1968 for young adults by Rotary International. Rotaract is now in 112 countries with more than 5,000 clubs and about 100,000 members.

Brensing said the Rotary Club wanted to sponsor a communityand campus-based club with onethird of the club being American K-State students, one-third international students, and one-third community members. All members must be in the 18-to-29 age ganized meeting April 19, filed with K-State as an organized club and also with Rotary International to get chartered, he said.

Manhattan Rotarians nominated 230 prospective members who were sent a letter of inquiry inviting them to attend a meeting, Brensing said. About 85 prospective members interested in joining Rotaract returned an application.

Of the 85 applications, he said he expected Rotaract to get about 50 charter members.

Future Rotaract members will be nominated by current Rotaract members, he said.

Rotaract members will be meeting weekly until the end of the semester to elect officers and establish the guidelines for the

'We want to get the constitution and by-laws adopted and officers elected by the end of the school year," Brensing said.

During the school year, Rotaract is required to meet twice monthly and should do at least one major project a year in the vocational, community, and international avenues of service, he Rotaract will operate under the standard constitution and by-laws of the international system, but the local club will establish its own rules too, Brensing said.

Study abroad aids education

American, foreign students trade places in International Exchange Program

By Cosima Hadidi Staff Reporter

Nearly 50 current and former K-State students can agree with the 19th century belief that a rounded education requires a period of study abroad.

These students have participated in the International Student Exchange Program.

The program was started in 1979, and K-State has been participating in it since 1986, said Walter Kolonosky, associate professor of modern languages and ISEP coordinator for K-State.

ISEP provides the possibility for students from participating U.S. universities to study at a university abroad for an academic year in exchange for a student from that country attending the U.S. institution.

A participating U.S. student pays his or her institution a fee based upon regular tuition, fees and room and board for an academic year. At the same time, a participating foreign student does the same at his or her institution. Then the two switch places, each attending the university of the other. This eliminates extra costs for students, said Kolonosky, especially when financial aid can be applied.

Students apply to institutions based upon the language they are interested in. It is also possible to study at universities in which the language of instruction is English, such as institutions in Great Britain, Australia, Canada and several others.

"As a rule, it is easier to place someone in a foreign-languagespeaking country," Kolonosky said, "A big target for K-State students is France, and we have placed most of the students who applied for it. For Great Britain, we have been less successful."

To study at an institution where the major language of instruction is not English, students must have completed four semesters of university courses in that language. All students must be enrolled at a participating university and have good academic standing in their field of study.

We have had students majoring in engineering, the social sciences and other fields," Kolonosky said. This program is not limited to language students."

Tom Gellenthien, senior in mechanical engineering, spent an academic year in Scotland.

"I took courses in my field and had a hard time at first trying to understand the accent," Gellenthien said. "I also never figured out the grading system. All I know is that I passed all my classes." "The students usually identify themselves to the professors and ask them to evaluate the work they do in a way that could be transferred to the U.S. system," Kolonosky said. "Our main office in Washington is responsible for transferring the credit to be applicable in the U.S."

But the educational experience of studying abroad is not limited to the classroom.

"The academic year I spent in Costa Rica was definitely educational from both a cultural and an academic viewpoint," said Paulette Watson, senior in Spanish and mathematics education, "I had to study a lot, but I also traveled a lot and met many people. It was a personally growing experience for me, and I would advise everybody to participate in the program."

For most participants, the programs provided insights and experiences they would never have been able to experience in the United

"I learned what it meant to be a minority," said Scott Quaintance, senior in French and chemistry who spent a year in the Ivory Coast. 'There was only one other white student at the university I attended, and he was from France.

"The experience has kept me very flexible mentally," he said. "I learned how to conduct myself in order not to offend people in their cultural system. I learned a lot of patience and how to be relaxed and not so uptight about things."

Gellenthien said he learned about how people from other cultures view the United States and its people.

"It was not very popular at the place where I stayed," he said. The students agreed they would advise other students to participate in the program and that it was a positive learning experience. "All the students who return are very excited about the program, and several have applied again to do another year in a different country," Kolonosky said. For the 1990-91 academic year, 22 K-State students have been placed in institutions abroad, and three more applications are being processed. The number of applying students has been increasing steadily since 1986, when only one student applied.

'3 Guys Naked from the Waist Down' play sends comics on whirlwind trip to stardom

By Todd Fertig Collegian Reporter

Comedy comes to the Purple Masque Theatre May 3 through 5, in the acts of Ted Klausterman, Phil Kunin and Kenny Brewster — three guys making the most of being caught with their pants down.

For the performance of the musical "3 Guys Naked from the Waist Down," the Purple Masque will become the comedy clubs in which the three unknown comedians take a whirlwind trip to stardom.

A Broadway musical by Jerry Colker, "3 Guys Naked from the Waist Down," is a story of the dreams, struggles and friendships of three comedians, played by Scott McLean, freshman in business administration pre-professional; Eric Towler, sophomore in radio and television; and Derek Walker, sophomore in radio and television.

Director Stephanie Sikes, graduate student in speech, said the title of the musical comes from the analogy that life often puts people in uncomfortable positions in which they must make the best of things.

The musical features demanding roles for three actors who perform stand-up comedy acts. Alone on stage, they'll sink or swim, depending upon their ability to evoke

The comedy monologues provide the actors a special challenge, Sikes

"They're really out there on their own at times," she said, describing the demands of stand-up comedy. "They really have to take the stage and have the audience in the palm of their hand."

To help prepare for their stand-up comedy routines, the actors performed excercises in improvisation and role playing prescribed by Sikes and Debra Myhre, a recent K-State graduate with a masters degree in drama therapy.

"We're practicing before the crew to have someone watching us, but being creative in front of an audience that doesn't know the story will be different," McLean said. "If you do something that isn't that funny, you'll just have to go on until something else works.

With only three actors in the entire show, playing roles which are so dependent upon each other, each actor said he has found that his own humor builds off what the other two do in their roles.

"We're really establishing a good blend, and when we're on stage together, our own personalities which come through seem to work together," Walker said. "One of us doesn't outdo the others, we just build off each other."

"Seeing them develop a stand-up personality within their characters makes me feel like we're all in the same boat," Towler said. "If I discover something about my character, it doesn't just effect the way I play the part, it effects the other two guys as well. It's a growing experience and we're all dependent upon each other."

For Sikes, "3 Guys Naked from the Waist Down" fulfills a nonthesis requirement which completes her masters of arts degree.

"It's a rarity for a masters student to choose to direct a musical be-■ See 3 GUYS, Page 10

FFA contest draws more than 1,000 high school students

By Shannan Seely Collegian Reporter

More than 1,000 high school students participated in the Kansas Future Farmers of America contests at K-State this week.

The 67th annual state competition began Sunday with the agribusiness contest and ended Tuesday with an awards assembly in McCain Auditorium, said Michael Dikeman, professor of animal sciences and industry and coordinator of the state contest.

Dikeman said several graduate and undergraduate students helped with the 13 individual contests that collectively made up the state competition.

Three of our students, Beth Gaines, Sally Stroda and Heidi Stichternath, took slide pictures of all the contests to put with music and show during the assembly," he

The contests ranged from meats and livestock judging to dairy products judging to newswriting.

"The contests are educational based on the agricultural education learned in the classroom," said Craig Guffey, adviser of the Tonganoxie FFA chapter. "It allows hands-on use of their abilities and improves their skills in the agricultural industry.

Guffey said this was the first year he had taught at Tonganoxie High School and the first time he had attended the state FFA contests.

"We didn't have FFA in my high school," he said. "On Sunday, I entered the same students in two dif-

New ID card introduced

Willie design to be phased into system for fall semester

> By Todd Ubben Collegian Reporter

Students from community colleges enrolling last week were the first to receive student IDs with a new design, featuring a logo of Willie the Wildcat. Incoming freshmen will receive them during fee payment in the fall, University Registrar Don Foster said.

Foster said the old design is still the new design won't be fully implemented until next fall.

"Since the current card is usable, we only expect to do this kind of card for new students coming in and for students whose cards have to be replaced in some way," he said.

Because the new design will not replace existing cards, the change was accomplished with very little expense, Foster said. Aside from the logo the new cards look and work exactly the same as the current ones. A decision was made a year ago to have only one identification card on campus, and the University ID card replaced the Wildcat Card, which was a declining-balance account

"When the decision was made that there would be one, we began looking at the design and working out ways to incorporate the Wildcat Card concept into the ID card," Foster

He said the new card received a postive response when it was shown to a group of student senators last

Richter said the two main strengths of the club are service and diversity.

"It's an opportunity for service and an opportunity to meet people with different interests and professional plans as one's self," he said.

Richter said Rotaract should provide good programs and a linkage with Rotary International as well as with other Rotaract clubs in the United States and throughout the world. He said this would be helpful to anyone traveling because of the immediate contact with fellow members in 160 countries.

"We hope to have a club that maintains a strong balance among American students and international students and people of the same age bracket in the community," he said.

Guffey said preparing for state competition takes time both in and out of the classroom.

"All year long, you have district contests," he said. "There's not enough time in the classroom, so then you practice after school and weekends."

State contests do more than test the students over areas of the agriculture industry, Guffey said.

"I think the students become more aware of other things happening around them than they would if they just stayed at home," he said. "Just in talking to other students, they find out what other organizations are doing."

Guys

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 9 cause you have to assemble the musicians and work on the vocals and all," Sikes said. "The show has got 21 people working to put three guys on stage. It's been a lot of everything together."

Sikes and members of her crew plan to give the Purple Masque Theatre a nightclub atmosphere for the performance. The small theater makes production difficult, but may help to give the intimate feeling of a small club, Sikes said.

A jazz combo will provide music typical of a nightclub setting, as well as working in the stand-up acts of the comedians.

In the preparation of every facet of the musical, Walker said the cast and crew holds the audience foremost in importance.

"The goal is to get the audience involved in the show," Walker said. "We're going to use them for a lot of the comedy, and that will make the show more exciting for them and us. Of everything about the show, most of all, they won't forget the atmosphere. It's going to feel like they're in a real comedy shop."

vice joined the system, and the cards will be used in the future for access to doors in the residence halls, Foster said.

Mike Hatch, Union computer electronics coordinator and committee member, said the Union lost the marketing advantage of the including an image of the University mascot when the Wildcat Card was done away with.

He approached Foster a year ago on the idea of changing the ID card so that it would tie back to the Wildcat Card program.

Hatch said the Union Promotions Marketing Office received the go ahead to produce the new template about a month and a half ago.

Ali Fatemi, associate professor of finance, said European economic integration will mean less competition and more cooperation between the various European states. U.S. companies will have to be more competitive, he said.

"There is a lot to be looking forward to and a lot to be wary about," Fatemi said. "If U.S. companies seize the opportunity, they can have high rewards, if not, they shall have to suffer and lose market shares."

Companies who only now are seeing opportunities of expansion and investment in the European market are almost too late.

"If U.S. companies are not as prepared as Japanese companies, they will lose their market share. If the Japanese are doing a better job preparing now, they will be ahead," Fatemi

He said Europe 1992 poses a challenge to the United States, but it will be less than the past challenges from the Pacific Rim.

"Europe will be big for itself. This does not mean that their gain is at the expense of someone else," Fatemi said. "It could be at the expense of another region, but this need not be the case. The destruction of barriers of trade among the European countries will mean the creation of additional welfare and satisfaction among the residents of those states."

Laura Oesterhaus, a K-State computer programmer, said she had a $6,000 increase in the valuation of a house she and her family have not even moved into yet.

"We were quite surprised," Oesterhaus said. "We haven't made any improvements. We haven't even mowed the lawn yet. I don't know where they get these figures."

Tim Brown, another Manhattan homeowner whose valuation increased by more than 15 percent, expressed concern about the process used to set the values.

"It's just a shoot-in-the-dark, harass-the-citizens type of thing," Brown said. "They've created an atmosphere where you don't know what to believe.'

South African leaders begin apartheid talks

By The Associated Press

CAPETOWN, South Africa - President F.W. de Klerk and African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela on Wednesday urged the swift abolition of apartheid and began historic talks aimed at ending whiteminority rule.

The three days of meetings are to remove obstacles to full-scale negotiations on a new constitution that would give the 28-million black majority a voice in national affairs for

De Klerk and Mandela, standing on the lawn of a Dutch colonial mansion where the talks were held, said South Africans of all races want swift change. All political parties must work toward a peaceful solution to racial and political divisions, they said.

Nearby, the pro-apartheid Conservative Party walked out of a debate in Parliament to protest the talks. The Conservative leader, Andries Treurnicht, said the government should not negotiate with an organization that has carried out guerrilla attacks and still is committed to armed struggle.

"South African law forbids all these actions," said Treurnicht, whose party is the main opposition in Parliament's white chamber. The tri-cameral Parliament also has chambers for people of mixed-race and Indian descent. Blacks are excluded.

Mandela, in a statement before the talks began, said: "The pace at which we move to arrive at a just solution should be informed by the fact that the black masses of our country demand and expect fundamental change now, and not tomorrow."

"The people as a whole want the peace and

Senators turn down most recent tax plan

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - In what has become an exercise in frustration and futility for the Republican leadership and Gov. Mike Hayden, the Senate soundly rejected Wednesday a new compromise property tax rollback plan.

On a vote of 14-26, the Senate turned down a conference committee report on a plan that would have increased the sales tax half a cent, broadened the sales tax base slightly and increased cigarette and tobacco products taxes to gain $127.4 million for property tax relief and the state general fund.

Of that amount, $115.4 million would have been used to reduce school property taxes about 16 percent, and $12 million would have gone into the state general fund to help fund the fiscal year 1991

After the vote, Sen. Dan Thiessen, R-Independence, chairman of the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee, switched his vote from yes to no to be on the prevailing side, so he could move for reconsideration later.

"If we don't pass this, I don't know when you'll have another opportunity," Thiessen told the Senate.

Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, conceded the leadership doesn't know what to try next, and Senate Minority Leader Michael Johnston, D-Parsons, said it is time for the GOP leadership to give serious consideration to adjourning the session without a tax relief bill being

"It's getting close," Johnston said. "Our members are getting restless. At some point, the leadership has to consider adjourning the session. We've given this issue fair and lengthy consideration and nothing seems to work."

However, Kerr said efforts will continue "until we adjourn" to find a tax plan that can gain 21 votes in the Senate and 63 votes in the House - the bare majorities needed for passage.

Asked if he had any new ideas to try, Kerr replied, "I don't."

With the Legislature completing the seventh working day of the wrap-up session and lawmakers talking of wanting to go home by Thursday night, time was running short for Hayden and the leadership to put together something that could gain any semblance of consensus in the two

Hayden was not immediately available for a reaction to the latest tax plan failure in the Senate.

A House-Senate conference committee had decided Wednesday morning to try the latest plan, which came from the Senate, even though just about everybody conceded it had no chance of winning House approval.

Alabama prosecutor indicts, pulls plug on X-rated channel

By The Associated Press

MONTGOMERY, Ala. - A Bible Belt prosecutor has pulled the plug on a national X-rated TV channel that beamed movies like "Ramb-Ohhh! Sex Platoon" and "Hardcore Girlfriends" to satellite dish owners. Civil libertarians are alarmed by the ease with which District Attorney Jimmy Evans, a Democratic candidate for state attorney general, drove New York-based Home Dish Satellite Networks Inc. out of business.

"What's happened is some little small town in the South is setting the standard for the rest of the country," said Martin McCaffery, vice president of the Civil Liberties Union of Alabama. "It's a horrendous precedent."

Evans says adult films have no First Amendment protection. "These movies not only violate Alabama's obscenity law, they violate every state obscenity law and the federal obscenity law," he said. "This is a national scandal."

He said he began an investigation after parents complained that their young children were obtaining videotapes of pornographic movies broadcast on the American Exxxtasy Channel, which was operated by Home Dish.

"I know from experience that hardcore obscenity leads to the abuse of women and children," the Montgomery County prosecutor said. "It's bad for our community and bad for our children."

The American Exxxstasy Channel transmitted hard-core movies to home satellite subscribers, but it also operated the Tuxxexdo Channel, a cable channel featuring R-rated "soft-core"

In February, a grand jury in Montgomery returned more than 500 indictments against Home Dish, three other out-of-state companies and 10 people on charges of distributing hardcore pornography via satellite into Alabama.

The other indicted companies are General Telephone and Electronics Corp., GTE Spacenet Corp. and U.S. Satellite Inc.

Minorities seek acceptance

African-American students say problems exist in race relations at K-State

By Julie Andsager Features Editor

Tomari Quinn Staff Reporter

Editor's note: This is the last in a series of stories about race relations at K-Although minority students find a welcome mat at the University door, after they enter they are often treated more as visitors than as contributing members of the community. More than 80 percent of African-American students polled said there is a problem with race relations at K-State, while slightly more than half of the white students polled said there is a race relations problem. The data come from an unscientific intercept poll taken at the K-State Union of 71 African-American students and 151 white students. "There are times I walk down the street, and people will yell racial slurs out the car window at me," said Greg Williams, junior in chemical engineering. "This is just one of the things we deal with everyday."

"Whoever said there's no racism here is not black," said Evonne Truelove, sophomore in business administration.

The question of race relations extends beyond K-State. University students will be among next 10 years. They will likely be dealing with race relations in the work

Demographics of the U.S. work force are expected to change by the year 2000, said Rosalind Fisher, director of personnel for personnel services. Minorities and women will be the predominant groups entering the work force, with non-whites making up 29 percent of the new entrants.

"We're going to have times when we're going to have difficulty communicating because we all have different cultural orientations, different backgrounds," Fisher said. "We're going to have to acknowledge those differences and say 'That's okay."

Resolving differences will require traditional expectations to be reevaluated. In the past, minorities have had to conform to the values and customs of the majority.

"There was a moment when many people believed the absolute goal of American society was this great melting pot where everybody was alike," said John Biggs, executive director of Manhattan Arts Council. Biggs was a K-State student from 1967 to 1973. "Maybe for some people that meant that everybody acted like white people, Anglo-Saxons."

The melting pot concept is outdated, however, Fisher said. It isn't realistic to believe various cultures and races will blend together, she

"Instead, we have to think of ourselves as like a variety of flowers some are poppies, some are marigolds, some are roses," Fisher said. We all need different amounts of sunshine, of water and of nutrients, and being different doesn't mean that one is better than the other."

Fisher said the growth of minorities in the work force will also affect universities. For example, she said, faculty evaluations will have to increase emphasis on service to accommodate changing and unique needs.

"I think we're going to have to take a look at our teaching styles," Fisher said. "Those teaching styles do not tend to recognize diversity. We have based those styles on one type of learner that does not even take in all whites, doesn't take in all white males.'

To encourage this diversity, the University has been working to actively recruit minority faculty and students, said President Jon Wefald.

Guerrillas, rightists meet

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) - A U.N. official opened indirect talks between President Alfredo Cristiani's rightist government and leftist guerrilla leaders Wednesday in San Salvador to try to get peace negotiations under way.

Alvaro de Soto, a personal representative of U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar, told reporters he handed Cristiani a draft proposal from the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front guerrillas at a brief meeting with the president. He refused to give details of the meeting.

In the proposal, the rebels offered to lay down their weapons and compete in coming legislative and municipal elections if the government purges the military of some ultrarightist officers and undertakes political reforms.

Under an April agreement the two sides reached in Geneva, de Soto will act as a go-between to arrange for direct talks.

He arrived hours after guerrillas attacked targets in the capital and dynamited power stations to protest what they called continued human rights violations by the armed forces.

Fetus-death suit to be filed

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) - A woman can file a wrongful death suit for a traffic accident that allegedly caused the loss of a 12-week-old fetus, the Missouri Court of Appeals said

Tuesday. The 2-1 ruling from the Missouri Court of Appeals in Kansas City could affect disputes over abortion rights and increase medical malpractice insurance costs, according to some legal experts. The state's appellate courts had never before allowed a woman to file a lawsuit based on the loss of a fetus too young to live outside the womb.

The appeals court, reversing a Jackson County judge, said Julius and Yulanda Rambo of Kansas City could sue because Yulanda Rambo allegedly suffered a miscarriage after a 1987 traffic accident. Jackson County Circuit Judge Thomas C. Clark had dismissed the case as being without legal grounds. The appeals court sent it back for trial, but lawyers say they expect the ruling to be appealed to the Missouri Supreme Court. Anthony P. Nugent Jr. and Gary Fenner, appeals judges in the majority, said basing wrongful death claims on a fetus's ability to live outside the womb put them "upon shifting ground" given medical advances. In his dissent, appeals Judge Donald B. Clark said the Missouri wrongful death law says "person" and clearly was not meant to apply to a non-viable fetus. The majority opinion "undertakes to create a new cause of action which has never before been recognized in this state," he said.

Joan Mahoney, a professor at the University of Missouri-Kansas City School of Law and an American Civil Liberties Union board member, said miscarriages are common in early pregnancy, and the ruling could indirectly affect abortion rights. Stanley L. Wiles, attorney for the Rambos, said abortion is a separate issue and that parents of a young fetus should be able to sue over its loss.

Wiles contends Yulanda Rambo, 22, had a miscarriage after her husband braked his car suddenly to avoid a hubcap that spun off a car in front of them. They sued the driver of the car, and the auto service that installed the hubcap, for $10 million.

Marijuana rally draws 250 LAWRENCE (AP) - Speakers at a rally to support legalizing marijuana said making the plant legal would help solve the farm crisis and wipe out America's cocaine problem.

About 250 people attended Tuesday's rally, which featured speakers from the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws. The rally was part of a national tour and was organized by Mark Creamer, 43, of Lawrence. Creamer deliberately got himself arrested for smoking marijuana in protest of President Bush's drug policy.

Shan Clark, a spokesman for High Times magazine, said marijuana could replace trees as the nation's primary source of paper because hemp fabric could be used to make textiles.

Farmers could grow marijuana and the drug could be legalized and taxed, with profits going toward the federal deficit, speakers said.

Student pleads innocent

A K-State football player who was charged in connection with the rape of a female student in Moore Hall pleaded innocent Wednesday to the charge.

Ramon N. Davenport, 21, of Union Springs, Ala., entered the plea in Riley County District Court. He remained free on a $1,000 bond.

A first court appearance was scheduled for Monday, at which time a preliminary hearing will be set, the Riley County attorney's office said.

Davenport, a sophomore in sociology, allegedly raped the female student sometime between midnight and 2 a.m. Saturday, said Cheryl May, news services director. K-State Police arrested him a few hours later, and he was released on bond that after-

May said that at 2:20 a.m. Saturday, the victim's roommate found her in the hall and took her to the Saint Mary Hospital. May said she was told the police arrested Davenport around 6:30 a.m.

May said as far as she knew, Davenport was arrested at Moore Hall, where he had been a resident.

Neither Davenport nor his court-appointed attorney could be reached for comment.

K-State sports information director Kenny Mossman, reading a statement from Head Football Coach Bill Snyder, said the alleged rape had no immediate bearing on Davenport's status with the football team.

"We have no intention of interceding in the process in any way," the statement said. "A court of law will decide, and then we will take appropriate and immediate action at that time." The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Campus issues are the topics of six persuasive speeches to be given by students enrolled in Public Speaking II, today at noon in Nichols Theatre.

Student Senate to deliberate alcohol policy

By Heather Stewart Collegian Reporter

A resolution concerning the consumption of alcohol in the KSU Football Stadium will be considered by Student Senate at 7 p.m. tonight in the K-State Union Big Eight Room.

'From the students' perspective, it isn't fair to let the alumni have tailgate parties on the other side of the parking lot, and not allow the students do the same," said Chris Kern, Senate chairman.

Bill Nelson, chairman of the Athletic Ticket Sales Committee, said he thinks Senate will pass the resolution.

"The only thing that has disappointed me is that all the publicity makes it look like this is a ploy to sell more tickets, and that is not the goal here," Nelson said. "It is because the rules concerning drinking on this campus are a little hypocritical.

"All areas on this campus (with the exception of dormitories) are designed to allow alumni to drink, but won't allow students who are of drinking age to do the same," Nelson

"Our policy is a hands-off policy where Senate is concerned," said James Epps, associate director of Intercollegiate Athletics. "Our departmental policy has been, and will continue to be, that we will enforce Kansas statutes on the consumption of alcohol. If that is amended in any way, we will be obligated to abide by

"We are not pushing for it in any way. It is obviously a controversial issue, and we are not taking any position," Epps said.

Charles Reagan, assistant to President Jon Wefald, said the administration wouldn't approve of having alcohol consumption at the stadium, even if Senate were to pass the resolution.

"Absolutely not," Reagan said. "We won't approve it, because the regents won't approve it. I think Senate is wasting its time."

Items up for first readings tonight include a special allocation for Ms. Rodeo K-State. Penny Garrett, junior in business, is currently the only K-State qualifier for this year's Ms. College Rodeo. The $344 allocation will provide lodging, food and traveling expenses for the National Collegiate Rodeo in Bozeman, Montana.

An allocation of $478.80 to Phi Beta Lambda for traveling expenses to go to Washington, D.C., will also be read.

The Recreational Services Task Force will give a presentation during open period to look at ways to expand the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex or Ahearn Field House to provide more area for the students to exercise.

Graduation gift alternatives suggested in your hand. Get away from that cash register. Put your money away. You are NOT, repeat NOT, going to buy your roommate that pen and pencil set for graduation. No, and not your brother/best friend/cousin/anyone else, either.

You're a college student, right? And if I'm not mistaken, a poor, starving college student at that - or at least that's what you said in your last letter home. So why waste your money on giving your buddy his 555th pen and pencil set so that he can throw it in a drawer with the others, and, if he's not careful, mail it to you for a graduation gift next year? You can be more creative than that.

Now, don't get me wrong. Pen and pencil sets are swell and everybody should have at least two, because they're bound to lose the first one. But believe me, Aunt Clara from New Beulahville, Georgia, will take care of one, and Cousin Myrtle from Happy Village, Florida, will supply another. If your friend is lucky enough to have godparents, they too can usually be counted on to mail in a pen or two. So it's up to you, the sympathetic fellow college student, to supply the new graduate with something he or she really needs.

Let's start with the basics: a case of beer. Every college grad needs one. Heck, when I top! Yes, you there, standing at the finally graduate and realize that I'm going to counter at Dillards with your wallet have to support myself, I'm going to need two. Maybe three, I don't know. For the nontraditional student, a bottle of brandy, fine wine, or even champagne will do. Not that I'm encouraging alcoholic excess on such a serious occasion. Nope. Not me. Never. But there are other useful things that are must-haves for the new grad just heading out into the world. Just a quick peek at the giftee's transcript should give you some hints.

The graduate in business needs a pair of vanity eyeglasses and a copy of the latest success manual to get ahead in the business world. I recommend little round metal frames for the accounting type and something in tortoise shell for the future manager. Make sure they make the graduate look honest, trustworthy, intelligent and yet somehow cold and ruthless as well - sort of a combination of J.R. Ewing and Snow White. And don't forget that women will need a gold chain to hang their glasses around their necks, because what used to be cool only for librarians is now hip in all the fashion magazines - and we all know real business women really dress that way, right?

Speaking of glasses, don't let friends graduating in theater or music leave school without a good pair of shades. They have endless uses: they hide that bloodshot-hangover look, provide an attempt at disguise (sort of a token effort) when the fame becomes too much to handle, and they conceal looks of envy and hatred at the Oscars and the Grammys. I hear you can't get into Hollywood without at least two pair.

And don't forget to pick up a whole garden's worth of those really neat dancing flowers for anyone graduating in horticulture. I hear they're even on sale - imagine that. And buy one of those pigs or cows that walks and oinks or moos for all your agricultural friends. Don't ask them what they want, though - I just know they'd rather be

Any future lawyers in your crowd? Don't send them off to law school without a case of No-Doz and your deepest sympathy. These people are going out of the frying pan into the school — they scare you to death the first year, work you to death in the second and bore you to death for the third. Sounds like button and a computer print-out of 101 Dan the first three weeks at K-State if you ask me. Oh, and don't forget to tell them some good lawyer jokes before they go. Pre-law students love those. Trust me.

English majors need one of those tweed sports jackets with patches on the elbow and a full set of the works of Sidney Sheldon. They could pick up a nice load of confidence, some will tell you they don't read trash like that, but they will be lying. By the way, did you know that Sidney Sheldon used to write for the Patty Duke Show? I can't decide if that should be an inspiration or a warning.

I'll tell you what secondary education maors have got to have. A whip. You were in high school. You know why. A baseball bat would do. Elementary education majors need a lasso and a megaphone. If you don't believe me, visit a kindergarten classroom and see.

Take some earplugs.

Anybody planning to do graduate work and teach at K-State, especially math or science, needs some of those little sandals. Actually they're big sandals. You know the ones I mean. And you might as well cancel that available, then beer is always nice ... subscription to Gentleman's Quarterly ...

fire. You know what they say about law afford one of those ties, let alone a suit. The perfect gift for the political science major is, of course, a Richard Nixon victory Quayle jokes.

> Il kidding aside, there are a few things that every college graduate needs. If you know where you direction in life, or a guarantee that it's all somehow worthwhile, that would be nice. A few seniors might appreciate it if you could put maybe just one more month of college life at its best in a box and let them have it to go. Or if you could figure out how to gift-wrap a good job, that would probably come in handy with maybe some job satisfaction, selfworth, a five-figure salary and a Mercedes-Benz thrown in for good measure.

> If there's anyway to put the American Dream in a package, I think any college grad would take that over the old pen and pencil set. Maybe even over a case of beer. But if the life that Cliff and Claire Huxtable live isn't they aren't going to need it for a while. Don't blame them — they don't get paid enough to hey — let's be careful out there.

Public relations firm won't save movement

Anti-abortion organizations came out in force across the country last weekend to solicit public support. For the most part, rallies staged for the sole purpose of attracting media attention accomplished their purpose.

Manhattan had a demonstration of its own. About 60 people attended a candlelight walk in an attempt to increase awareness about their cause.

But now anti-abortionists are finding that free news coverage is not enough. Because more prochoice proponents are voting on the basis of the issues, rather than on the merit of political candidates, the anti-abortion movement is losing ground.

Anti-abortionists, who have thus far relied upon prayer and politicking to further their cause, have now resorted to a more reliable method - money. Anti-abortion groups nationwide raised $5 million to hire a public relations firm to promote their ideals.

It's the desperate act of a dying

Photos of fetuses haven't done the trick. Small children carrying signs decrying abortion haven't triggered enough response to overturn Roe v. Wade. Citing verses from the Bible hasn't warranted a message from above.

The abortion argument has been raging for 17 years. It's not a question of whether abortion is right or wrong; it's a question of rights. When and if the right to choose is revoked, the precedent will be have been set for the denial of other personal freedoms.

Anti-abortionists need to recognize that pro-choice does not necessarily mean pro-abortion. The right to have an abortion is just that - a right. It is neither a mandate nor a privilege.

People who believe in personal freedom have known this all along. If that knowledge has strangled the anti-abortion movement, a public relations firm certainly cannot prevent the anti-abortionists' last

Opinion lacks sense

I was surprised and disappointed to read that the Collegian editorial board supports the Student Senate resolution to allow alcohol consumption in the stadium parking lot before football games. The subject resolution is short-sighted, and so was the Collegian editorial supporting the resolution.

The editorial board lists three reasons why they support the resolution; the current system is hypocritical, it will help the police enforce existing laws, and K-State's alcohol policies are "archaic."

The editorial did not specify how the current "hypocrisy" is being committed, so I can only assume that they are referring to a lack of enforcement on the part of the University police. In a telephone interview, KSU Police Captain Charles Beckom explained that any lack of enforcement on the part of the police is due to the fact that the University can only supply 17 officers to patrol a stadium of 20,000 (or more) people Beckom explained that there were so many alcohol-related disturbances and accidents at the games last fall that officers had little time to spend on the enforcement of existing laws. In short, the K-State police department does not have the staff to patrol a designated drinking area and Beckom believes that passing the resolution will not create a safer or more managable environment.

The editorial board did not specify why existing alcohol policies qualify as "archaic," but maintaining and enforcing the existing restrictions on alcohol consumptions before football games only makes sense. Coach Bill Snyder and the athletic department do not support the resolution, probably because they realize that alcohol, automobiles and thousands of people do not mix.

This is not an issue of students' rights or morality, it is an issue of safety. Yes, people sneak beer into the parking lot and drink before games, but creating a designated drinking area will not alleviate this occurrence. If Senate accommodates the desires of those people who wish to drink in the parking lot before football games, they will legitimize drinking in a high-risk situation.

The Senate resolution is a bad idea and the editorial board should do a better job or researching their issues before they print their

Lefty desks needed

Editor,

K-State does not provide enough lefthanded desks for its students - 15 percent of its population or roughly 3,000 students. I surveyed 12 randomly selected rooms and found a total of three left-handed desks cause some serious problems for us lefties. One problem is that it is very uncomfortable to sit in the desk. Another problem, the most serious problem, is the way it positions our bodies. It appears that we are looking directly at the person diagonal from us, this can create a lot of problems when taking a test. An easy and cheap solution to the problem is to require all newly-built buildings to have tables placed in them instead of desks. The solution for existing rooms is to have a certain percentage, hopefully 15 percent, placed in them.

Jana Leep's column in Wednesday's Collegian was excellent. As a male who has been trying to shed my "callous man" for nearly a decade now, I especially appreciate your empathy for those of us who are trying. Your column was not only accurate, but heartfelt, insightful, articulate and full of wisdom. Thank you.

Handicapped actors present 'Pocahontas'

By The Collegian Staff

The Exceptional Theater Company will present "Pocahontas" at 9:30 a.m. today at the First Lutheran Church of Manhattan in honor of Norman Fedder, professor of speech.

'We present a play to Dr. Fedder each year since most of the actors are students in his Theater For Special Populations class. There are also mentally handicapped children from the Manhattan area in his class," said Georgia Becker, director and author of "Pocahontas."

"This is very beneficial to both the college students and the mentally handicapped children to interact with one another, especially for those who plan to work with mentally handicapped people in the future," she said.

It has become a tradition for The Exceptional Theater Company to produce a play for Fedder because of the interaction of both groups.

"We perform at least once a semester for him," Becker said. The Exceptional Theater Company has been performing for six

"Aside from performing for Dr. Fedder, we perform for churches, elementary schools, retirement homes and service clubs from Topeka to Lindsborg," Becker said.

We perform at least once a semester for him (Fedder).

This year three college students helped Becker organize the production. Kathy Kitchen, junior in preoptometry, oversees the music and Briana Nelson, junior in life sciences, and Ursula Andrzejewski, senior in elementary education, work backstage, she said.

The Exceptional Theater Company is funded through grants from the Manhattan Arts Council, the Kansas Arts Commission and the Little Apple Pilot Club.

Alumnus describes career

Former politician recounts beginnings of student body government

By William Sier Staff Reporter

At age 90, Judge Earle Frost still reacts with the reflexes of a long-time politician. He smiles, and his right hand shoots out almost automatically to shake hands.

Frost, the University's first student body president, was on campus April 26 for an alumni reunion. Frost graduated from K-State in 1920.

"My experience in college politics helped me later on in law school, as a lawyer and as a judge," Frost said.

When Frost first came to college in 1916, he said he was a "green kid from Marshall County, Kansas." He had no political career goals at that time.

"Back then, college students were supposed to do what they were told," he said, and they did not talk back."

Frost said he wasn't even involved in campus activities until he set the University pole vault record in 1917. Then people started to against Pendergast. notice him.

Frost and some of his friends, with assistance of some faculty, formed the Student Self Government Association and wrote the first student constitution in spring 1919.

Frost was not the first elected president of the SSGA.

'The fellow we elected in the spring of 1919 for some reason couldn't come back that fall, so we had a run-off between me and the football team's drop-kicker," Frost said. "I won."

Frost went on to Columbia University law school and began working as a lawyer in New York City for $60 a month.

Eventually, Frost moved to Kansas City. He said he became involved in local Republican politics in 1938, at the time the party was about to unseat "Big Tom" Pendergast, a prominent Democrat. Members of the Republican party wanted Frost to campaign

"Because I was the Republican precinct captain with the most signatures on my petitions (against Pendergast), they asked me to run for municipal judge," Frost said, "but I kept turning them down because I was just getting started in my new law practice."

Music faculty tests protective earplug

By Anne Krauss Staff Reporter

For musicians and people in other noisy professions, hearing loss is a daily risk.

Simple options for protection include standard earplugs or earmuffs, but these devices usually distort sound. A special earplug designed on the principles of balanced attenuation is being tested at K-State and could provide protection while allowing for true hearing, hearing without distortion.

"A common problem with most hearing protection devices is they cut out more high frequencies than low frequencies and distort what the musician hears," said Harry Rainbolt, associate professor of speech and audiology. "With this, you can hear the true characteristics of the music at a lower intensity."

Rainbolt said the device is custom fitted and lowers the sound level about 15 decibels across the whole frequency range. The earplugs have been on the market for awhile, but the cost makes their use somewhat prohibitive, he said.

The device is being evaluated on the basis of comfort, the wearer's ability to hear acutely and critically judge music and any development of side effects or distortion.

"They're being used a great deal on the West Coast," he said. "A person out there told me they were running about $120 a pair.'

'Cats, Shockers rained out

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

WICHITA - A steady rain forced first, a 25-minute delay, and then, ultimately, a cancellation of K-State's baseball game against Wichita State Wednesday night at Eck Stadium.

The rain, which forced the teams to forego batting practice, continued through the first one-and-ahalf innings, and the umpires stopped play with one runner on and no one out in the Wichta State half of the second inning.

Prior to the stoppage of play, K-State had taken a 1-0 lead. L.J. Twyner singled to lead off the Wildcat first and moved to third on a wild pickoff throw by Wichita State pitcher Kennie Steenstra that eluded Shocker first baseman Bryant Winslow and rolled up the

After Russ Ringgenberg lined out, Brian Culp hit a slow roller to Shocker second baseman P.J. Forbes, who threw home in an attempt to retire Twyner, who had broken from third.

Catcher Doug Mirabelli failed to handle the throw, however, and Twyner scored on the error.

K-State starter Mike Dunaway worked his way out of a jam in the bottom half of the first. He induced WSU's Nos. 4 and 5 hitters into a pop out and a fielder's choice grounder after a pair of one-out walks and a steal put runners at first and third.

K-State opens a four-game Big Eight series against Nebraska Friday afternoon in Lincoln. Doubleheaders will be played both Friday and Saturday.

Royals victim to rain

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Wednesday night's game between the Milwaukee Brewers and the Kansas City Royals was postoned by rain and will be made up as part of a twi-night doubleheader Aug. 10.

Wednesday's scheduled starting pitchers, Jaime Navarro for the Brewers and Mark Gubicza for Kansas City, will pitch Thursday night.

KC ownership may change

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Royals called a news conference for noon Thursday amid speculation that an announcement would be made concerning the team ownership.

Ewing Kauffman, the team founder and co-owner, has been reported negotiating a loan or buyout of Avron Fogelman, who purchased a half-interest in 1983 but has fallen upon hard financial times.

"Royals' owner Ewing Kauffman will have a statement," the Royals said in a prepared release.

The Kansas City Star reported in Thursday's editions that Fogelman proposed putting the team up for sale but giving Kauffman the final bid. Citing unnamed sources, the newspaper said Kauffman had not decided whether to accept Fogelman's proposal.

The paper said Fogelman's proposal would enhance Kauffman's chances to regain full control of the team. But it said a third party could take 100 percent of the team with an extraordinarily high bid.

Fogelman, a real estate developer from Memphis, Tenn., paid a reported $11 million for half-interest in the team and was actively involved in club management. Kauffman, who founded the team in 1968, holds the other half.

Fogelman recently has been conspicuously absent from such team functions as the signing last winter of free agent pitchers Mark and Storm Davis.

Kauffman was asked at the time what role Fogelman played in the negotiations and replied, "None."

Part of the proposed deal calls for Kauffman to lend Fogelman $34 million, the Star said.

Mizzou probe on hold

OVERLAND PARK, Kan. (AP) - The investigation of alleged recruiting violations in the Missouri basketball program is a top priority of the NCAA, but the case probably won't be considered at a hearing next month, an NCAA spokesman said Tuesday.

Bob Minnix, an NCAA enforcement agent, said the official letter of inquiry "hasn't even been sent out yet, and we've got to give them six weeks to respond. If they ask for an extension, in all likelihood, we would probably give them that, too."

The next meeting of the NCAA Infractions Committee is scheduled June 21-24 in Kansas City. The following meetings are Aug. 11-14 in Colorado Springs, Colo., and Sept. 28-30 in Overland Park.

"I would say to you now that Missouri making the June date, based on where we are right now, is probably improbable," Minnix said in an interview. He said he expected a letter of inquiry to be sent to Missouri soon., Tuesday

"It's the top priority for us right now," he said of the Missouri investigation. "We're a lot closer than we were a week ago. We have continued to work on it. Everybody wants to get it done, get it out and get on with it."

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Iain Fraser had a goal and an assist Wednesday night as the Kansas City Comets held on for a 4-3 victory and a 2-0 series lead over the Wichita Wings in the MISL Eastern Division semifinal playoffs.

Colt Summer Squall contender for Derby

By The Associated Press

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - First he was called Thunder Bolt, then Stormy Weather, then Storm Cloud. Finally, it was Summer Squall.

By any name, the colt is a leading contender for Saturday's Kentucky Derby at Churchill Downs.

For a time in February it looked as if Summer Squall was going nowhere.

Having recovered from a hairline fracture of the right-front cannon bone that ended his five-race unbeaten campaign as 2-year-old, Summer Squall bled during a workout

Feb. 15 at Gulfstream Park. "It wasn't a trickle," Cot Campbell, president of Dogwood Stable, said of the bleeding. "There had never been any indication of bleeding before. It was a fluky thing." Campbell and trainer Neil Howard think the bleeding might have been the result of a fungus or bacteria. "He was one of 35 horses who bled during a 10-day period in Florida,

Campbell said. Veterinarians gave the OK for Summer Squall to start in the sevenfurlong Swale March 17 at Gulfstream and the colt finished second, a length behind top sprinter Housebuster. Campbell said it "might have been his best race, given the circumstances."

Two weeks later, Summer Squall won the Jim Beam at Turfway Park and two weeks after that won the Blue Grass at Keeneland. Both races were run at 11/4 miles on muddy tracks.

Now comes the 11/4 -mile Derby, and Summer Squall figures to be no worse than the second betting choice to unbeaten Mister Frisky, winner of all 16 of his starts.

"Summer Squall is the horse to beat," said Ron McAnally, who trains Arkansas Derby winner Silver Ending.

Seventeen 3-year-olds were expected to be entered Thursday, which would make the 116th Derby worth $786,000, with $611,000 to the

"If we don't have bad luck, I have great confidence he'll run well," Campbell said after the son of Storm Bird put in his final Derby prep Wednesday.

The colt's name is based on that of his sire. Thunder Bolt, Stormy Weather and Storm Cloud were rejected by the Jockey Club because they already were being used.

Pat Day, who will ride Summer Squall, was present but exercise rider Robert Vickers was aboard the colt when he worked five eighths in 1:12 and galloped out three quarters in 1:16 3-5.

It was the first half mile, however, that was the real move. After Summer Squall had gone the half, Vickers stood in the irons after another 50 yards, and the colt galloped out

"We were looking for anything on the underside of 49 seconds," Howard said. "It got his blood pumping. He looks good. He's eating good. He's training good."

Musberger to join ABC staff

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK - Brent Musburger, abruptly dismissed by CBS last month after a decade as the network's top sports broadcaster, joined ABC Wednesday as a football and basketball announcer.

"Five years ago, I came within an eyelash of going to work for them," Musburger said. "I'm thrilled to get another opportunity.

"I got fired on April 1 and I came back on May Day. That's long enough for me."

ABC Sports president Dennis Swanson said Al Michaels would still be the network's top football announcer. Michaels is attempting to get out of his ABC contract and has filed an arbitration grievance against the network.

"We've got Al under contract and we expect Al to do Monday Night Football this year and be involved in the 25th anniverary Super Bowl," Swanson said.

Swanson said Musburger would announce college football games with former Philadelphia Eagles coach Dick Vermeil and college basketball games with a analyst to be decided later.

He also will broadcast one of ABC's NFL wildcard playoff games, host the Super Bowl pregame show next winter and broadcast the World League of American Football.

Musburger's first appearance will be on a prime time special on June 25. His first sporting event will be the Hambletonian on Aug. 4, followed by the Little League World Series three weeks later.

Musburger said he has no problems working with Michaels.

"I consider him a friend. And I'm hopeful that he'll be at ABC for as long as I am," Musburger said. "It has not been discussed - between Dennis and I - anything about Monday night."

The 50-year-old Musburger had been host of "The NFL Today" since 1975. He also broadcast college football games and anchored CBS' coverage of the Masters golf tournament, the NBA finals, the Pan American Games and U.S. Open tennis highlights shows. He was let go by CBS on the eve of the NCAA championship game, his final appearance on the network.

When Musburger began broadcasting in Chicago in the late 1960s, Swanson was on the air opposite him. The two also broadcast against he other in Los Angeles before Swanson got off the air and joined management.

After Musburger was dismissed by CBS on the eve of the NCAA national championship game, he accused CBS Sports president Neal Pilson and executive producer Ted Shaker of trying to force him out. Musburger also said they had spread rumors that he was hard to work with. The national title game was the last event Musburger worked for CBS.

"It was the one thing that hurt because the one thing I'm not is hard to work with on the field," Musburger said. "It's all past, I can't worry about yesterday. The proof will be what the people at ABC say about me in a couple of years."

Musburger's 51/2 -year contract with CBS, which paid him $2 million per year, was to expire in July. Neither he nor Swanson would say how much the new deal was for or how long it is to run.

By The Associated Press BERN, Switzerland — The Soviet Union, relying on its experienced players, shut out Czechoslovakia 5-0 on Wednesday to win a record 22nd World Hockey Championship.

"I didn't worry before the game. This was easy for me," quipped de-fenseman Viacheslav Fetisov, who was playing in his 11th world tournament.

"We had much better conditioning and skated better than the Czechoslovaks," added Fetisov, who completed his first NHL season with New Jersey before joining the National Team after the Devils were eliminated from the Stanley Cup playoffs. Fetisov had two assists and was the second-highest scorer among defenseman in the championships. "But I think this is my last world

The Soviets were third in the preliminary round with a 5-1-1 mark after losing to Sweden 3-1 and tying Canada 3-3 for their worst finish since the playoff format began in 1976. But they saved the best for the important games. "I'm absolutely thrilled with this

"It was unique because we were not regarded as favorites," Tikhonov said. "But Soviet hockey remains at the top and is one of the best there is in the world."

Tikhonov, who has guided the Soviet Union to eight world titles and two Olympic titles in 13 years as coach, said this one was "doubly special."

"It was very special for me as well as the Soviet team," Tikhonov said. 'We had big problems with the lineup before coming here and we reshuffled it during the tournament."

By Tammy Breitenbach Collegian Reporter

A friendly, furry bear carrying a swimsuit visited about 120 kindergarten, first- and second-grade children at St. George Elementary School Wednesday.

"Happy Bear" travels to preschools and kindergarten through second-grade classrooms to help prevent child sexual abuse. The Happy Bear program is sponsored by Pawnee Mental Health Center in Manhattan.

The program is low-key, said Barbara Hayter, public information and education specialist at the center. During the presentation, moderator Brenda Thomas explains to "Happy Bear" that his/her private parts are the areas covered by his/her swimsuit, "Happy Bear" holds up both a boy's and a girl's swimsuit during different parts of the presentation.

"The older children know exactly what we're talking about," Hayter said. "I'm not sure if the younger children know exactly where they put their swimsuit so I'm not sure if they are as conscious of exactly what we are talking about.

"But if a baby-sitter or an uncle or a stranger starts fooling around with the general swimsuit area, that's close enough for the children to begin to have confused feelings," she said. "So whether or not they know exactly the three square inches that 'Happy Bear' is referring to isn't as important to us."

Informing children about their private regions isn't the only goal of the presentation, Hayter said.

"We are only there for a halfhour," she said, "but what we hope is that it will give (the children) permission at some level to talk about it with a parent or a teacher and help them identify it as something that they don't need to tolerate.'

Hayter said sexual assault on children is probably no more prevalent now than it has been in the past, but society has considered it taboo to

"We hope that we're telling them problem, there are people who can help you with it,' rather than 'If you have a problem, don't let anybody know," she said.

The script focuses on how the children should react if they are assaulted.

We target more about how the child feels about what's going on," Hayter said. She said she believes the children can understand being happy, feeling good or bad, and feeling confused, scared or upset.

"We hope that we are reinforcing that anything that confuses them or makes them scared or unsettled, it's okay to back away from it and talk to an adult they trust and feel comfortable with about what happened," she

Thomas said it is obvious in some cases that there are children in the audience who need to be reached by the

"Some children get very frightened of 'Happy Bear' in the first place," Thomas said. "They don't want to touch him, they don't want to hug him; they want to get as far away from him as they can.

"Some of them, when you talk about private parts, get very nervous might be jibber-jabbering along until we get to the part about private parts, and they don't say anything. I would just assume from those kinds of reactions that they have been exposed to some type of inappropriate sexual touching.'

Some of the children have humorous reactions when they aren't sure if there is a person inside 'Happy Bear,' Thomas said.

"If one of them figures it out, they make a point to tell everybody else in the class," she said. "So then when they come up to give you hugs at the end of the program, they're trying to look in the eyes to see if there is a person. When they shake your paw, they try to see if there is a hand under there, or some of them figure out that it's a girl underneath the suit."

Hayter said the children aren't too young to begin learning this type of nformation.

"I think that we're talking about a lot of things with kids that we didn't before," she said. "When we were in one of the schools last spring, we walked into a kindergarten to talk to them about 'Happy Bear,' and the teacher had them put away their AIDS workbooks."

Job Fair to attract educators

Graduates to meet high school and elementary administrators at annual event

By Amy Hadlock Collegian Reporter

Education majors and graduates will have the opportunity to meet prospective employers at the Teacher Job Fair from 8:30 a.m. to noon May 18 in the K-State Union Courtyard.

This job fair has proven to be a very worthwhile way for students in education to meet administrators of schools that are looking for teachers," said Willard Nelson, adviser in the College of Education. "It it is a very good way for the graduates and students to make contacts."

The job fair is sponsored by the College of Education Student Council and the Career Planning and Placement Center.

The main reason for the fair is job placement for recent graduates, Akin said. It also helps the Career Planning and Placement Center stay in touch with students looking for jobs in education.

'We have the fair after graduation so that we don't lose contact with our graduates," he said. "In the past, after graduation we would lose contact with our graduates and then the jobs would be gone. This is close enough to graduation that we won't lose contact."

Nelson said the fair also gives education students the opportunity to look at what type of jobs are available.

Lacking the proper equipment and playing ground, a group of students from India, Pakistan and Bangladesh have found a way to play cricket, the sport they grew up with. It is a way that might shock most cricket players.

The students play on the ba-sketball courts of the Derby Complex, substituting tennis balls for cricket balls and chairs for

"We play cricket, because we miss cricket a lot here," said Tariqul Matin, senior in electrical engineering from Bangladesh. "For me, it's my first love. It's my blood. I really love that game."

Three of the seven major cricket-playing nations are in the Indian subcontinent, and Matin said the students live with cricket and watch it regularly.

"We miss it so much that even if they have something to do, homework or something, they try their best to make it to the game, he said.

The players named their team Derbyshire, after a county in England.

Matin said the Indian students sometimes form a team and compete against the students from Pakistan and Bangladesh.

Cricket is normally played with two teams of 11 members each, but Matin said 12 to 15 students get together.

The players wear only minimal pads and lack the protective helmets usually worn by the batsmen, Matin said.

The offense in cricket comes from batsmen, and the defense is comprised of a bowler, wicket keeper and nine fielders, he said. The bowler tries to stump the batsmen with the delivery of the cricket ball, similar to a pitcher in baseball. The batsmen keep hitting until they are declared out.

The batsmen score runs for the offense side by running between two wickets 22 yards apart, or by hitting the cricket ball past boundary lines for four or six runs.

A similarity exists between cricket and baseball, but Matin said cricket remains his favorite

"The first couple of years I never even looked at (baseball), because I missed cricket so much," Matin said. "I said, 'If I watch this game, I don't think it will make up for what I'm missing."

The team is not funded through the University, and the players have had to pay their own expenses, said team captain Ferzan Ahmed, senior in electrical engineering from Dinajpur, Bangladesh.

Besides competing among themselves, the players have competed the past two years with other teams such as the K-State Cricket Club.

The team is 2-1 against the KU Cricket Club, which has been in existence since the 1950s, Ahmed said. The K-State team lost to the West Indian Cricket Club of the Midwest Cricket Conference last summer in Kansas City.

The club has received invitations from the University of Tulsa Cricket Club. For two years in a row, the club has also been invited to the Midwest Cricket Tournament by MCC president, Keith Furguarharson, Ahmed said.

The players have declined both times because a restriction requires participating teams to play at least one road game and one home game. They are unable to play home games because they have no playing field.

Ahmed said the lack of funding and a playing field has caused the players to lose interest in the team.

British band debuts with 3 R's

London-based quartet presents subtle intelligence, creates mood with first album

REVIEW

The Sundays, a new British pop band, belie their naive facade on their debut album, "reading, writing and arithmetic," with a subtle intelligence that permeates the seemingly simple songs.

The London-based four-piece group possesses a shimmering modern sheen and a dedication to whimsy. The album is a breathless journey through 10 slightly skewed

The focus of the Sundays is vocal-ist and lyricist Harriet Wheeler. Although the band is a cohesive whole, Wheeler's dreamy voice is easily the factor that sets the Sundays off from

Wheeler effortlessly evokes a number of moods with her voice. She can shift from a maddening wail to a child-like giggle within a song. Sinead O'Connor is a possible reference point, although the two women differ in approach. Where O'Connor is often darker in tone, Wheeler takes a flightier tack.

Wheeler's emotional voice is a perfect match to her often obscure lyrics. Another singer's interpretation of the Sundays' songs might lack the dimensions of the originals. Wheeler injects added vitality to already strong songs.

"You're Not the Only One I Know" might seem to be a bitter brush-off in the hands of another. The chorus begins, "You're not the only one I know. I'm much too proud to talk to you anyway." Wheeler's delivery suggests the negative message of the song is just a front and she is merely teasing.

The singer imbues some bittersweet irony in her songs to give them an achingly pretty quality. "Here's Where the Story Ends" includes the vague line, "It's that little souvenir of a terrible year that makes me smile and smile." The song is sung with such positivity that it cancels out any bleak suggestions in the lyrics. The Sundays' songs are thought-provoking because of the emotional weight added in their performance.

The band can create a consistent, involving mood at times. "A Certain Someone" is a constantly shifting tale. Wheeler begins the track playfully as a material girl who thinks only of herself. "If I could have the whole world for free," she sings in the chorus, "I wouldn't share it with any one else but me." Eventually, the mood shifts to coy romance when she admits she might share it with "a cer-tain someone." The song concludes on a somber note in a maelstrom of Wheeler's wordless wail. The following track, "I Kicked A Boy," begins as an aural relief to the tension of "A Certain Someone." The simple guitar strumming and innocent voice take on a darker tone when Wheeler admits she "thinks about the time I kicked a boy 'til he cried." The Sundays sport an influence of mischief and eccentric Brit-

Humor is a Sundays hallmark. The lyrics are populated with flighty quips and throwaway remarks. The pristine "Can't Be Sure" contains the immortal lines, "England, my country, the home of the free, such miserable weather." Wheeler adds to the song by singing with affection, not

"Hideous Towns" is full of odd puns. The singer does not consciously try to be absurd, but it often happens anyway. "I joined the army, the Salvation Army, but it didn't help," Wheeler sings in a tale of selfrealization gone wrong.

Some of the quirks in the Sundays' music come from guitarist David Gavurin's compositions. Several songs carry a traditional three-chord progression, but the chords used are more from the realm of jazz than pop and never lapse into the expected.

The execution of Wheeler and Gavurin's compositions are abetted by the competent performance of the band. The Sundays are tight. Their sound suggests a fusion of the dark, probing tones of the Cure and the openness of improvisational jazz.

The Sundays make a strong debut with "reading, writing and arithme-tic." It is full of clever wit and able musical backing. Although the band is not a showcase for Harriet Wheeler, her songs and singing make the album the appealing work that it

The fights, which began about one month ago, usually consist of a group of residents getting together, sneaking up on another group and pummeling them with pillows, he said.

Six or seven pillow fights have occurred, but they are less frequent now, he said.

"It's pretty much dying down now because finals are coming up," McIntyre said.

The staff at the hall has been trying to catch the students participating in the fights. However, he said it is difficult to do since the fights only last about a minute.

Rosanne Proite, assistant director of housing, said there have been no incidents of pillow fighting reported at other residence Similar pillow fights occurred last year, McIntyre said. In the largest fight, a group of Marlatt residents attacked residents of Moore Hall with pillows.

Proite said the students who initiated last year's pillow fight at Moore were not identified, and no disciplinary action was taken as a result of the incident.

Family farms diminishing in numbers

Students face post-graduation career decision

By Clinton Wolf Staff Reporter

"How are you going to keep them down on the farm?"

In an era of a diminishing number of family farms, this question is taking on new significance. For students from farms who must decide whether to return home, the question becomes a career decision with no easy answers.

Todd Sheppard, senior in agricultural economics and agricultural economics club president, said the small size of his family's farm means he won't be returning after graduation.

"You have to have a pretty big op-eration," Sheppard said. "A lot of kids who are in ag would love nothing better than to go back to the farm, but they can't.'

Steve Harbstreit, assistant professor of agriculture education, said he sees the economic situation of the farm as playing a large role in student decisions.

Harbstreit said that when he was a high school agriculture instructor in the early '80s, parents would question why he was teaching their children about agriculture.

"If they're in deep financial trouble," he said, "their parents' attitude is not going to be real high. (Their parents) are probably not going to encourage them to go into production agriculture."

Negative comments from parents influence the decision about not returning to the farm, Harbstreit said. "They may not want to admit that," he said, "but they do." Tracy Harlow, senior in electrical engineering, said he came to the University with the desire to find a job away from the farm. "I chose to go to college to get an education, to do something different," Harlow said. "That way, I could look for a job in my field. If I didn't like it, I could go back to the

Service offers farmers access to advice, encouragement through toll-free hotline

By Clinton Wolf Staff Reporter

Farmers have free access to advice and encouragement through the Farmers Assistance, Counseling and Training Service.

The primary work of FACTS' nine full- and part-time personnel is answering calls to the FACTS hotline number, (800) 321-FARM. The service was established by the Kansas State Board of Agriculture in July 1985. Located in Leasure Hall, it operates in cooperation with K-State.

Charlie Griffin, extension rural family support specialist and assistant director for FACTS, said the hotline receives an incredible variety of calls. Individuals may call the hotline because they are having emotional difficulties, are facing stress, or are suicidal, he said. Some may lack basic necessities.

"People call us when they don't have food or shelter," Griffin said. Rick Peterson, crisis intervention specialist and counselor for FACTS, screens incoming calls.

Peterson said he deals with emotional and family difficulties himself, but may refer clients to a financial counselor, or to Forrest Buhler, attorney for FACTS.

Buhler said FACTS also serves as a mediator between farm clients and creditors during financial foreclosures. Under Kansas law, a bank must inform the owner before foreclosing on agricultural land. The Farmers Home Administration is also required to have a mediator in certain cases. In these situations, Buhler said he works with creditors and clients to find a payment plan that will work, or revise an existing

"I guess we haven't helped everybody, but we've certainly helped some," he said.

Char Henton, mediation case coordinator and family needs specialist, said one advantage of the hotline is that a farmer can pick up the phone and call during stressful times, rather than drive into town for advice.

Farmers are becoming more willing to seek help, Henton said. "People are acknowledging that they're under stress and they're doing something about it," she said.

Part of her job is helping farmers find off-farm employment when needed, Henton said. Reaching that goal includes determining the person's interest and skills, teaching them how to sell themselves in the job market, and informing them of the resources within their community. It also includes a lot of encouraging.

Many individuals who call the FACTS hotline number do not realize the effects that financial problems can have on their relationships, Peterson said.

That pressure and that stress affects the family," he said.

Part of the stress on farm families arises when work can't just be left at the office, as with other jobs, Peterson said.

Good communication is part of overall effective management, Peterson said. While it is often easy for farm families to discuss financial and legal struggles, many find it hard to admit emotional and personal difficulties as well.

"We neglect that communication process," he said. "Issues get stuck in a drawer somewhere but are not ■ See FARMER, Page 12A a non-agricultural career, they may later return to agriculture to repay family loyalty, Peterson said. He said if the farm becomes financially unstable, family members with careers outside agriculture may rally around the farm and support it.

Pursuing a non-agricultural degree has kept his options open, Harlow said. It's also changed his perspective.

"When I came to college I thought I'd just get an education and go back," he said. "Now I think I want to work in electical engineering for a while and maybe go back later. If I hadn't gone to college, I'd be out of

Sheppard said he sees a more students going into a different career for two or three years, settling in town, and then starting to "hobby farm." Without strong financial capital, it is almost impossible for a college graduate to go directly back to the farm, he said.

Farm children also undergo a socialization process when they are raised with a whole family that farms, Peterson said.

"You've kind of been socialized into farming," Peterson said. "Your idea of yourself is that you'll be a farmer. Other factors may be at work as Farm children may look to their parents for career role models, he said.

"They say parents don't influence career choice," Peterson said, "but why do doctors' sons want to grow up to be doctors, or lawyer's sons want to be lawyers? If you grew up with your dad as a farmer, that's what you know."

If the oldest child is offered the family farm, Peterson said, younger siblings wanting to pursue production agriculture may be told there isn't room. Parents may be forced to decide who will get the family farm, he said, or may be divided as to whether they want their child back on the farm.

Conflicting ideas about career choices can put tremendous pressure on farm families, Peterson said, and ruin farm marriages. When a farm son marries a girl from the city, the wife may not expect the isolation and long hours that farm life entails.

They get out there, (and) they find it's not the life they thought it would be," he said.

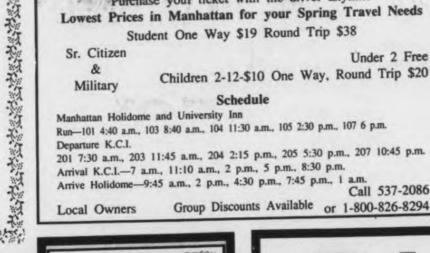

While farming is a business and is seen as devoid of family issues by some, Peterson said an understanding of family loyalty and structure would be helpful to those in production agriculture.

"It's being aware of issues and how they may potentially affect you," Peterson said. "We overlook the importance of those other

QUESTION: Why not add on to existing schools or use mobile units?

ANSWER: None of the existing school sites, K-12, have either the minimum site-size recommendations or the support areas (lunch rooms, gyms, libraries, etc.) needed to accommodate more students than already exist in those schools. Presently we have "two-unit" temporary classrooms, all of which are filled, at Amanda Arnold, Bluemont, Northview and Theodore Roosevelt elementary schools. We expect to install even more mobile units in 1990 because of the space needs of larger classes coming up through USD 383 at Woodrow Wilson, Ogden, Bluemont and Eugene Field, and if needed, one unit at Lee or Marlatt. The majority opinion from each study, survey, and series of meetings conducted in the last two years has shown USD 383 needs to build more space.

A few miles west of Matfield Green the fences end, giving cattle free run. The sign serves as a warning: you are responsible if you kill roaming livestock with your vehicle.

Betty Sampson rides her three-wheeled bicycle home after shopping in Cottonwood Falls.

hase County is a slice of Kansas. It is friendly and warm, and ranching is the vibrant life of the 3,300 residents of the county. Cottonwood Falls and Strong City are the sister cities of Chase County — they are one mile apart, and used to be served by a trolley. Cottonwood Falls is the larger of the two, but not by much. Both have a population of less than 1,000.

Open range, the title of the section, refers to pastures without fences; a place where cattle freely roam. Open also describes the people. Friendliness and a relaxed attitude are a hallmark of the people here.

Eight Collegian photographers found genuine hospitality to be the rule when they spent two days and a night in Chase County, about 50 miles south of Manhattan on U.S. Highway 177. Thanks in a large way to the obliging welcome of town dwellers and ranchers, what started as a visual investigation of rural communities for a class in photojournalism turned into this eight-page publication.

Thanks are also in order to the Wichita Eagle, the political science department and the people of Chase County who were our subjects.

Even the streets are friendly in Cottonwood Falls. As the Chase County seat, Cottonwood Falls boasts the county's largest population: 954.

he hustle and bustle of a big city are foreign here in Chase County. There's no rush to get everything possible done in a day. There's always tomorrow to finish it. Why ruin your health by worrying about things?

A big part of spring in Chase County is burning the range. Every year in March, the Flint Hills are covered by dense smoke as quickly moving flames remove lifeless grass. Using a rake packed with burning grass, Elmer Lawrence moves along the edge of a pasture, burning a patch of grass ten feet wide. The burned patch acts as a barrier, preventing flames from consuming an adjacent brome grass field. The owner of the brome field follows on a water tank. With water from his tank, he puts out flames as they reach the edge of his field. But like most Chase Countians, they are unhurried even as a wall of flame burns right up to the edge of Another group of men is unhurried while playing golf on Saturday afternoon. Afternoon golf isn't odd, but the putting surfaces of sand and pastures that line the course are different. The only spectators are a few cattle peering over the fence. The golfers talk about the latest coaching changes at K-State. When I asked them if I could walk along behind their carts and take some photographs, they would hear nothing of it - my walking, that is. No amount of arguing from me did any good; they wouldn't even let me ride on the back of the cart. One of them took the uncomfortable spot on back and made me ride up front, giving their guest the choice seat.

Putting others first is consistent with the small town values throughout the county. Hard work breeds respect. By David Mayes hey're supposed to be backwards. The n's in the sign for the Red Bandana restaurant are backwards to get people's attention, said Donna Watson.

Watson is the owner of the restaurant along with her sister, Annette Herpich. The two researched the feasibility of their restaurant in Cottonwood Falls before they bought the building, and they opened the Red Bandana doors on Feb. 25

The name is as authentic as the restaurant. It is the only restaurant around that serves bierocks, a German meat dish, dinner rolls and cinnamon rolls all from the same dough recipe. The dough that Watson researched for several years and finally produced is so unusual that it was patented and sold to a frozen food company.

Watson said that at her previous restaurant she needed a dough that could be made in advance and frozen until needed.

The recipe for the dough doesn't exist on paper; it's all in Watson's head. "I mix out of my head. I don't measure anything."

When the Red Bandana opened it was just the two owners doing all the work. The days start at five every morning with the mixing of the dough for dinner rolls and other specials. Since then, the sisters have cut back some hours and employed some help from the family.

Business has been good and has a regional pull, Watson said. Their restaurant was recently placed on a state register for places to stop and visit.

"We had some people from Kansas City just last week. ... We're finally getting known," Watson said.

Charges dropped; hearsay rejected

By Robert Short Special Projects Editor Paula Selby

Managing Editor Editor's note: The names of the family members involved in this case have been excluded to protect the children.

As a result of a judge's decision, child abuse charges have been dismissed against a Geary County man. Some involved in the case say the decision contains errors and an incomplete consideration of testimony.

The man was charged with taking indecent liberties with his then 2-year-old twin daughters during visitation. The mother of the children is a non-traditional K-State student in District Court Judge Melvin Gradert ruled in March to disallow any hearsay testimony in the criminal case by professional counselors and others who had interviewed the children.

After the child hearsay had been ruled inadmissable and the now 4-year-old children were ruled incompetent to testify, the charges were dismissed because of insufficient evidence.

The case was dismissed without prejudice, meaning it could be reopened if additional evidence or witnesses are provided.

Sandra Coyner, director of the Women's Studies Program at K-State, said she disagreed with Gradert's decision. Coyner, who has attended a majority of the hearings, became involved with the case by helping set up the Children's Protection Fund to offset the mother's legal

"I think the opinion is a travesty," Coyner said. "I was shocked."

Coyner said she and others are considering filing a complaint against Gradert because he did not consider the findings of several professionals. She said Gradert left out much of the testimony that contradicted his opinion and that he "misinterpreted all the rest."

"I know of a number of people who are so surprised they are investigating it further," Coyner said. Kay Gareis, a school social worker and the mother's neighbor, has testified in the criminal and divorce cases. She said according to testimony, there are a number of errors in the judge's decision.

In the decision, Gradert wrote, (The mother) made a report to the Kansas Social and Rehabilitation Services ...'

However, according to court testimony, Manhattan SRS was originally contacted in July 1988 by Virginia Chaput, a therapist at K-State's family center. Gareis later contacted SRS in May 1989.

"The mother never alleged anything; she was only concerned with what the (twins') behavior meant," Gareis said.

Gareis said when she explained her intent to contact SRS, the mother "begged" her not to act.

'She pleaded with me to not report it," Gareis said. "I explained it to her that I'm a mandatory reporter and I don't have any choice.

David Troup, a Junction City attorney representing the father, said the memorandum opinion given by Gradert reflected many of the points he had argued.

"Much of it was taken word for word from the brief I had prepared," ■ See DECISION, Page 12

Director says fire call received at 3:55 a.m.

By Margaret Clarkin Collegian Reporter

The first call to report the early morning fire at the Evergreen Apartment Complex on April 19, came at 3:55 a.m., said Alvan Johnson, director of Riley County Police Department.

Jim Cunningham, a resident of the complex, said he called at about 3:30 a.m. Johnson said the police department has determined that Cunningham's call actually came 46 seconds after a call from Eric Larson, freshman in environmental design.

"Cunningham did call," Johnson said. "Larson called at 3:55. Larson was on the phone when (another line of) 911 rang. The dispatcher had him hold and on the other line was Cunningham. He called 46 seconds after Larson called."

Cunningham said he realizes he was mistaken in the time that he

"After they said they found it, and realizing when I called, I'm satisfied the call was received - but not satisfied that the system is not infallable," Cunningham said.

Cunningham said he believes that the 911 system is dated.

"I don't think they have the most advanced 911 technology," he said. "She (Det. Carla Swartz, the person who handled his comments) explained how if calls come at the same time, one can override the other.'

Johnson said Cunningham's call was brief, and it ended before Larson got off the phone. "We've concluded that the computer was locked on the first call (from Larson)," Johnson said. "The dispatcher didn't disconnect it to lock on the second call."

One way a call is recorded is on a computer print-out. Since the computer was locked on the first call, the print-out did not show the second call. Another way calls are recorded is on a complaint sheet, which is typed by the dispatcher.

Emergency calls are also taped on a voice recording. The voice recording enabled RCPD to identify Cunningham's voice.

We had Cunningham come in, and he identified his voice," Johnson said. "He did make the call. He was mistaken about the time.' There is an additional recording process that notes the call received and the time, said Larry Woodyard, assistant director of RCPD.

'We have a thirty track (system) that records all police radio traffic and 911 calls," Johnson said. "Twenty-nine (tracks) are communication and the 30th records the time. Anytime a call comes in, we can record it to the second."

Johnson said Cunningham must have been awakened to Jared Akers, freshman in electrical engineering, yelling. Larson left Akers at the scene and then called 911.

Johnson said no arrests have been made in connection with the fire.

'(The apartment fire was) never classified as a set fire," he said. "The fire department classified it as a suspicious fire."

Volunteers bring dogs, cats, rabbits for elderly to play with on Saturdays

By Sandy Hegarty Collegian Reporte

Elderly people in nursing homes cannot have the companionship of a pet on a regular basis, but a group of Manhattan residents has found a way to bring them some warmth,

Three Saturdays a month, Harold Larson, his wife and a group of volunteers take their pets to area nursing homes for the elderly residents to play with. Larson, coordinator for pet day activities, said they usually have five to seven volunteers.

The volunteers visit College Hill Skilled Nursing Center, Stoney-brook Health Center, Wharton Manor Nursing Home and Mea-dowlark Hills Retirement Community. Larson, who has been doing this for four years, said the pets usually stay about an hour.

The pet day program is sponsored by the Riley County Humane Society. Teresa Bradley, fourthyear student in veterinary medicine, started the program in 1985 and coordinated it for the first two

"When I first moved to Manhattan, I worked for a veterinarian and saw one of the Humane Society's newsletters," Bradley said. "I had worked with the elderly before and thought this would be a good idea."

Usually only cats and dogs are taken to the homes, but once in a while a few unusual pets show up. Bradley said they have had horses, rabbits, rats, snakes and cockatiels.

"We've also had llamas, potbelly pigs and fainting goats, except the goats wouldn't faint for us," said Marjorie Henton, activities director at Meadowlark Hills. "(The residents) really do enjoy this day."

"It's just amazing what people can do with the pets," Bradley said. "It allows them to touch and feel and love something wonderful."

Bradley told the story of a woman who hadn't spoken anything but sentence fragments for years, but when a kitten was placed on her lap she talked in complete "A friend and I took a horse once, got up and walked all the way outside to where we were unloading it," Bradley said. "He used to own and ride horses." Henton said the residents are always asking when pet day is. They want to make sure they are in the activities room on that day.

"You bet I like animals," said Edna Beckman, Meadowlark Hills resident. "My neighbor and I used to share a cat.'

"We used to live on a farm and had 17 dogs," said Jerry Miller, Meadowlark Hills resident. "I like to pet the dogs."

Besides enjoying the animals, the elderly also look forward to seeing the volunteers, Bradley said.

'Even though you're only there once a month, you develop a relationship with the people," she said. "They really look forward to you coming with the animals and for the conversation. It's just a really great program."

Land groups consider unifying

By Elvyn Jones Collegian Reporter

A number of groups established since the Army announced a possible land expansion will meet today to consider forming an umbrella organization.

In late March, Fort Riley announced the location of four 82,000 acre sites under consideration.

Mace Thornton, assistant editor of publication services for the Kansas Farm Bureau, said Preseve the Heartland, Save the Heartland, Heartland Alliance, Save Rural Kansas and Kansas Economic Enhancement for its People are among the groups that will be present at the meeting. They joined two groups, Preserve the Flint Hills and Preserve Rural America, organized last spring after the Army first announced its expansion plans, Thornton said.

Linda Peterson, of Burdick and chairperson of Save the Heartland, said two or three representatives from all organizations will meet at the Rock Springs 4-H camp in Geary County. She said she expects an umbrella organization to be formed at the meeting.

Gary Hall, of Chapman and president of Kansas Economic Enhancement for its People, said he hoped any umbrella organization formed would keep the vitality of the existing local organizations on the grass-roots level. He said his group has organized a latter-writing campaign to senators Bob Dole and Nancy Kassebaum and Rep. Jim Slattery.

Hall said it is important to get a clear definition of the issue at the meeting today. Discussion of expansion has turned into the question of which is more important to the surrounding area, Fort Riley or the rural communities threatened by expansion, he said.

Hall said he hopes the groups can frame the issue in a way that recognizes the importance of Fort Riley in national defense and to the state's economy, but stresses the alternatives to expansion that allows the Army to keep a viable presence the fort.

"Many communities make the whole," he said. "The end result of the loss of any community, Fort Ri-■ See EXPAND, Page 12

Former hostage beaten after attempted escape

By The Associated Press

BOSTON - Former hostage Frank Reed was severely beaten after an escape attempt and was told his mother had died even though she's still living, his daughter said Thursday.

"He didn't know she was alive until he was released," said Marilyn Langston. "We were able to tell him she was very much alive."

Reed's mother, 91-year-old Leota Sprague, shares an apartment in the suburb of Malden with Reed's wife, Fahima, and the couple's 9-year-old

Langston said she was told Thursday by a State Department spokesman that doctors had decided Reed, who is weak after 42 months in captivity, should undergo further medical tests.

Frances Jones, a spokeswoman for the State Department's Bureau of Consular Affairs, said Reed would be flown to Andrews Air Force Base Friday, then probably to Walter Reed Army Medical Center, where former hostage Robert Polhill was taken after being released April 22.

Jones said it was unclear how long Reed would stay in Washington before continuing to Massachusetts.

Party losing local elections

With an unpopular new local tax - the poll tax - the key issue, Conservative fared badly in areas ranging from some of their heartlands in the prosperous south to northern industrial

But initial Labor gains were less than the massive victory predicted by opinion polls, which give the socialists a lead of some 20 points. With results declared early Friday from nearly half the 201 councils being contested, Labor had gained control of seven councils, while the Conservatives had lost four, including the key northern city of Bradford.

The elections were the first comprehensive opinion test since Thatcher won a third successive term in 1987.

Lithuanians seek recognition

WASHINGTON (AP) - Lithuanian Prime Minister Kazimiera Prunskiene appealed to President Bush on Thursday to formally recognize her government's independence from Moscow.

"I think he's going to see how events unfold there, and he's going to take decisions which are compatible with U.S., Soviet

"I don't think that the president has made a final decision as to what his positions are going to be on Lithuania," Prunskiene

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said Bush told Prunskiene to take back to Lithuania this message:

Brain cell research advances

WASHINGTON (AP) - Brain tissue from a child has been nurtured into a colony of living cells that eventually may be used to replace the damaged brain cells of people who suffer from Alzheimer's, stroke or head injury. Dr. Solomon Snyder of Johns Hopkins School of Medicine in Baltimore said his research team has, for the first time, developed a continuous culture of human brain cells that divide and grow in laboratory dishes. Other researchers called the discovery one of tremendous significance that may cause an explosion of new research and treatment in brain diseases. However, years of laboratory studies on the cells will be needed before the brain cells can be used on human patients, Snyder said.

The study is published in Friday's edition of the journal

Scientists have long been hampered in their study of the brain because human brain cells won't reproduce. Except for very limited exceptions in isolated areas of the brain, humans at birth have all the brain cells they will ever have.

If a substantial number of those cells are damaged by disease, injury or stroke, functions controlled by those brain cells are lost forever.

Snyder said in a telephone interview that the cultured cells underwent 31/2 years of vigorous testing to assure they aren't an abnormal growth such as cancer, but are, in fact, normal brain cells.

NATO to reduce troops, arms

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP)- The United States and its 15 Western allies agreed Thursday to hold NATO and East-West summits this year to reach treaties reducing troops, tanks, artillery and other non-nuclear arms.

The decision was announced after Secretary of State James A. Baker III briefed NATO foreign ministers on a new U.S. nuclear missile cutback and on the need to adapt the alliance to a lessened Soviet military threat.

NATO Secretary-General Manfred Woemer reported the alliance's consensus to have a summit in London in early summer and an East-West summit in Paris by year's end.

"NATO is preparing for the future," he said. "The Atlantic alliance is taking advantage of the historic opportunity to move from confrontation to cooperation."

The sole sour note was an accusation by Woemer, the former West German defense minister, that the Soviets were footdragging in negotiations to reduce troops, tanks, artillery and other non-nuclear forces.

Baker stressed that holding the 35-nation summit depends on completing the Conventional Forces in Europe (CFE) treaty.

Employees receive hate mail

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) - Hate mail similar to that handed out by the Ku Klux Klan has been sent anonymously to black managers at Hallmark Cards Inc., company officials

Hallmark is unsure whether a new affirmative action program prompted the racist mailings.

The mailings began after 35 top executives met to discuss a new plan that will link senior managers' performance ratings with how they promote minorities.

Company spokesman Steve Doyal said the hate material, at a rate of two a day, has been sent in the company's internal mail system. Officials said they don't know whether those responsible work for Hallmark.

Doyal said no written documentation of the affirmative action policy has been distributed. Until now, a manager's minority hiring record was not part of the formal performance evalua-

Seventeen black managers have received envelopes containing two photocopies of hate material that has been distributed in Kansas City in the past by members of the Ku Klux Klan. Doyal said handwritten threats on the photocopies have been addressed to some of the recipients. Kansas City police and Hallmark's internal security are investigating the mailings but so far have no suspects.

Lawyer files new evidence

TOPEKA (AP) - An attorney for Wichita oilman James W. Hershberger filed an 11th-hour motion Thursday, seeking a new trial and alleging that new evidence shows the government's chief witness plotted to murder his client and set fire to Hershberger's business.

The motion, filed by attorney Thomas Haney, also alleged that another key government witness was mistaken about Hershberger's attendance at a meeting at which she said she revealed her discovery of suspicious oil movements and invoices.

Hershberger is scheduled to be sentenced Monday by Judge Dale E. Saffels in U.S. District Court. He faces a maximum sentence of 120 years in prison and $70,000 in fines. He was convicted on Feb. 21 of 25 fraud-related charges in connection with what prosecutors said was a scheme to defraud investors and banking institutions in connection with the operations of his now-defunct company, Petroleum Energy Inc.

Manhattan Civic Theater focuses on communication

By Bill Sier Collegian Reporter

Developing self-awareness and communication skills through dramatic techniques is the focus of a series of workshops at the Manhattan Civic Theater.

During the next three weekends, MCT will be sponsoring Super Saturday Theater Workshops for adults and teenagers. The workshops will meet in the Poyntz Avenue Cabaret, MCT's theater, located on the lower level of the City Auditorium.

Linda Uthoff, coordinator of the program for MCT, said people shouldn't let the name scare them off.

"It is not a performance situation," Uthoff said. "It's a workshop in learning how to use theater or games to interact with other people."

Some of the techniques to be taught are brainstorming, problem solving and using communications techniques, she said.

"People will not be required to do real 'far out' stuff," Uthoff said. "These workshops are not so much about drama as they are about communication.'

Yael Carmi, graduate student in drama therapy, will be teaching the workshops this year. Carmi said she has a lot of experience in this type of instruction because she has taught similar classes and workshops in her native country of Israel.

Although Carmi studies drama therapy, she said she does not like to use that title to describe her work.

"I prefer the term 'developmental drama," she said. "The drama I work with makes the public part of the drama, and the drama part of the public."

Carmi said she doesn't like the word therapy applied to her work, because she is not a psychologist.

"My work is not just for those who out awakening another side to a perneed treatment," she said. "I want to son, rather than changing them.

bring the people and the theater onto common ground."

Carmi said in the Israeli city of Eilat, where she was director of the community theater, she went houseto-house attempting to convince people to participate in a similar program.

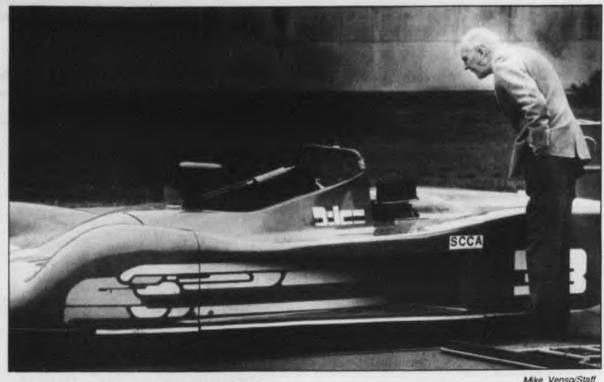

Out of a city population of 27,000, Carmi said that she had more than 100 actors and 8,000 other residents involved in her theater group.

"We had people from all age groups and many different occupations," she said.

She said the dealt with solutions to social issues.

"But we were able, through improvisations and street theater, to work out possible solutions to these everyday topics," Carmi said.

Sorority to colonize

University elects to limit membership of Sigma Kappa; housing construction scheduled for completion by 1992

By Tammy Breitenbach Collegian Reporter

Sigma Kappa, a national sorority, plans to start a new colony this fall at K-State.

"We're very experienced in campuses like K-State," said Paula Jenkins-Williams, national public relations director for Sigma Kappa, "but we are limited by the number of women we can take."

Jenkins-Williams said that the colonization agreement with the University limits the maximum size of the new chapter to the average size of other sorority chapters on campus, around 145 members.

"If we found 145 great women on our new campus, then we would begin our colony with 145 members," she said. "However, if we found only 120 women who we felt met our criteria, we would begin with 120 members."

Jenkins-Williams said she is confident the Sigma Kappa rush effort will bring desired results.

"Part of the success of a new group is starting it off on the right foot," she said. "It's quite an investment to Sigma Kappa (starting a new chapter). We go all the way out, because you need to in order to get the kind of women that we

Jenkins-Williams said the sorority's investment in promoting rush will be proportional to the number of members they pledge.

"If you just put up one flyer, that's the kind of rush you're going to have," she said, "but if you do everything first class, all the way, everything's top of the line and you're very professional in it, then you're going to be very successful.

Jenkins-Williams said about 90 percent of the Sigma Kappa sororities installed within the last 10 vears have maintained quota and chapter strength comparable to the established sororities on campus.

"The kind of women who will start a new chapter are a little bit different," she said, "because they have not joined an existing chapter for one reason or another. A lot of them tend to be leaders on campus who aren't affiliated or people who just never thought of it."

Plans to build a house on the lot south of the Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority are underway, and the house should be completed by fall 1992, said Barb Robel, adviser for greek affairs.

"I think they will be successful, because we have built into the written agreement the timeline on housing," Robel said. "In order to be competitive, they'll need that housing. Consequently, the agreement reflects that housing is absolutely essential."

The colonization team will be made up of five to seven alumnae from Sigma Kappa national headquarters, who will be joined by area alumnae and active members from the University of Kansas.

The national team will conduct informational meetings Aug. 15 and 16 in the K-State Union to correspond with the first round of rush, Jenkins-Williams said.

Beer home-brewed to taste

By Heather Anderson Collegian Reporter

To college students, beer is often synonymous with parties and thoughtless consumption. But for some, brewing the beverage is a

The Palace in Aggieville sells supplies for home beer brewing, and owner Dean Taylor said the brewing process is simple.

"Brewing quality beer at home is as simple as stirring the ingredients and capping the bottles," Taylor said.

He said home-brewed beer is of better quality than beer purchased in stores because commercial brewers usually add preservatives to give the product a longer shelf life. "Beers brewed at home are pure beers," he said. "Basically, all you need to make beer is barley, hops, sugar and yeast.'

The Palace sells ingredient packages to make 60 bottles of beer for about $12. Included in the package are a can of malted barley extract syrup, four cups of sugar, hops and a package of yeast.

The syrup, hops and sugar are added to five gallons of water. After mixing the other ingredients, the yeast is added, and the mixture is left to ferment for four to seven days in a fermenting bottle or bucket.

A fermentation lock is put on top of the fermenting container and filled with water. As carbonation forms in the beer, carbon dioxide will bubble up through the water in the lock. When the bubbling stops, the beer is finished fermenting.

The beer is then bottled and left to age for three to six weeks.

Beer made from the Palace recipe contains about 5.4 percent alcohol, Taylor said.

The Palace also sells the equipment needed for brewing.

Taylor said that as far as he knows, The Palace and another store in the Kansas City area are the only stores in Kansas to offer beer-brewing ingredients and equipment for sale.

Taylor said his business attracts four or five new beer brewers a month. He also has regular customers who purchase ingredient packages about every other month.

"Different people make different quantities," Taylor said. "Most people take pride in giving their beer away to friends or relatives, or have large get-togethers and drink it."

Jess Starkey, painter for the Department of Housing, has been brewing his own beer for two years. He said he brews beer for a hobby and gives most of it away to friends "It's better than anything you can buy," Starkey said. "It lasts longer; it's all natural, and it has more body

Hiring practices lack racial sensitivity

resident Wefald's recent letter in the Collegian is encouraging. He is anxious to do more for awareness of minority problems. Unfortunately, techniques of cultural sensitivity are not being emphasized to the extent that knowingly or unknowingly we are still not coming together as one. According to my experience here at K-State, there are people with good intentions who are otherwise very kind toward minorities, but are restricted by certain influences in promoting minority advancement. I have been in the United States for almost 11 years now, half of this time I lived in Manhattan and the rest in Boston,

On visiting Manhattan in October 1989, I was delighted to find the record number of enrollment at K-State and the large increase in international students. However, the city, as well as the campus, has not done enough to improve relations between different races. A few incidents of discrimination and prejudice off-campus, which I witnessed, would be irrelevant here and would be more suitable in the local daily. I will only present before you a situation which I had quietly reconciled to, but now, encouraged by the President's letter, feel inclined to look at from a different perspective.

It was in the month of November 1989 that I went to see my supervisors and co-workers at K-State Union Food Service. I had worked in catering from March 1980 until June 1984 at the Union and on the basis of my performance was put in charge of Bluemont Buffet, a VIP eating place on the second floor. As Malley Sisson, director of food service, was busy, I left my business card with the secretary. On my next visit, I was told that Sisson was impressed with my advancement and was looking for someone to fill the position of catering manager. Earlier, when I was here as a student, our manager was Joe Anderson, who has since retired. I was told that Sisson could not find another person to fill the job until Connie Bates, who had vacated her position as dietician/supervisor returned from Germany with her husband. She had moved to Pennsylvania in the summer last year, so the position was open again. I was informally interviewed by the director, and she seemed to be very pleased with my experience. She hired me as emergency help the very next day on an hourly wage. She told me that the cater. ing manager's job would be advertised soon and that the new manager would be required to start in January 1990.

I was assigned to VIP catering at President Wefald's house and other such events. In regard to my performance these four months from November 1989 till March 1990, I can only say that President Wefald and his wife complimented me on several occasions for doing an excellent job. Sisson greatly praised my hard work and dedication. The catering manager's position was advertised in December, and applications were accepted until Jan. 19. I was fully qualified, according to the advertisement, and applied with confidence. For references I gave the names of Joe Anderson (retired banquet manager), Professor William Richter (head of the Political Science Department) and Richard Holien, under whom I had served as general manager of Vie-de-France, a restaurant in Cambridge, Mass. Richter was very kind to write a letter of reference to the personnel department, but the other two gentlemen were not contacted, I found out later. Toward the middle of February I was asked to make a presentation, which I did. Judging from the events following my presentation, I am sure it went very well. I was introduced to the director of maintenance and was enrolled for CPR, which I attended and was certified. Sisson kept me with her while video-taping the training session of new student employees. I was scheduled to go through the files of VIP specialist Katy Vinson with her, as she was going on maternity leave. A few days later, I received a call from Sisson asking to see her in her office as she had made a decision concerning the catering manager's position. The next day I was told that the job had been offered to someone catering any more when the new manager started. No sufficient reason was given to me for being denied the job. I was also told that I would be more useful to a company which has an extensive training program. To help me financially, she offered to visit with the heads of the departments of production and Stateroom cafeteria to see if they could give me some hours. She also said she greatly appreciated my honesty and dedication to the

I thought at the time and still think that she made a professionally honest decision of hiring an available, qualified person from the majority who everyone would be comfortable with. I cannot conceal my disappointment and the feeling that my ethnic background was the major factor in not being selected. I shine on the outside because there everyone had seen me; I was not tested or trained on the menus or the food. My work in Union Food Service for almost five years was enough to give me an advantage over other candidates. Some of the final questions I was asked were inappropriate. I was asked if I ate a lot of ethnic food or if I ate the regular American food. I was also asked whether I knew about the different American spices, if I could handle pork and how much experience I had with alcohol.

hus a job held by a minority person (both Anderson and Bates are minorities), for as long as I can else, and it would be better if I did not work in remember was passed on to one from the majority. The provision in the state law should have been kept in mind that if two candidates are equally qualified preference would be given to the one from the minority. Also, though I believe it is totally unintentional, none of the 15 key positions in the food service are held by any minorities. The cordial relationship among student workers when the catering manager was an African-American and most of the banquet leaders were international students is fading away. Some of the banquet attendants were uncomfortable when I was put in charge. One such incident I reported to my supervisor who diplomatically hushed it up.

> I am leaving Manhattan for good in the near future after losing my self-esteem and my savings. My best wishes go to the efforts of President Wefald to make K-State more aware of multi-racial sensitivity. I consider it a blessing in disguise that I did not get the job, as it would have been difficult for a Pakistani-American to bring up his children in this closed society of Manhattan. However, I will have done my duty toward all groups if this article gives some food for thought.

Attitude change needed to achieve harmony nals begin, we are all scrambling to finish projects and read those textbooks we've been neglecting for very least, our behaviors. too long.

But before we depart for summer vacation, we should each take a few moments out of our day to examine our prejudices.

It's easy to say "I'm not racist" or "I don't think there is a problem," but apparently a problem with race relations does exist at K-State. It may not be out in the open, but it is there nonetheless.

The University administration should be commended for the stance it has taken against racism. The programs encouraging multicultural diversity that are soon to be implemented are a positive step forward.

Racism, however subtle, is a fundamental conflict throughout the nation. For K-State to take a leading position in the fight for true equality makes a statement about our concern for the future.

But the fight must come from more than an administrative level. No matter what the administrative policy says, K-State will continue munity. Let's stop it now.

Many people, when they move from Manhattan, do not consider their family pet - the dog or cat who has loved and trusted them, and with whom they have had enjoyable times. People who have pets should be responsible enough to do the best for the dog or cat who has been a companion to them. This means not taking them to the animal shelter the day they move or turning them loose. Do not wait until the last moment, but advertise several weeks ahead of time to find that dog or cat a new home so you can find out how it is adjusting to it. Turning pets loose to fend for themselves is a disaster for the animal. If the person who dumps a pet has a conscience it should haunt them forever. By calling 537-9515 Wednesdays and asking for Pat, you can put a 15 word pet adoption advertisement with a two-day limit in two newspapers. These advertisements are free. In order to get more tips on finding a home for your pet you may call the Pet Hotline at (913) 456-2592.

At the present time, there are many dogs at the shelter. The exorbitant fees charged to adopt a pet do not help people adopt them, even if they want a pet. Many of these animals face certain death. How do you think the pet who trusted you would feel to be deserted, sent to its death or left along the road to starve? If you care about your pet and cannot find it a home, take it home with you and then take time to make sure it gets a good home.

Lawsuit costly

A very sad situation has developed at K-State. It appears that between 100 and 300 sections of classes are going to be cut next semester because of a lack of funding. With that in mind, why did the University break its football contract with the University of Wyoming? The ensuing lawsuit cost us an undisclosed sum of money, while our only gain was another home football game. Couldn't that money have been used in a more productive manner?

Story misleading

On Tuesday, April 24, with the help of a classmate I gave a presentation on the recycling habits of Manhattan area bars. I thought the idea of creating some publicity about the issue was great. On May 5, I noticed the very small section on the front page of the Collegian dedicated to the recycling of bottles in bars. This wasn't exactly the type of "publicity" I had expected. The article's headline, "Bar owners divided on bottle recycling" was misleading. How could such a general statement be made when only four bars and one restaurant were contacted? Among those five, yes, the recycling decision was divided, but Manhattan alone includes at least 15 bars.

I conducted a very informal survey on Thursday, April 19 of nine area bars for the purpose of our presentation. Of these nine, only four had some form of recycling program. One interesting note is that two of the bars contacted by both myself and the Collegian gave different responses. When I spoke to a bartender at Charlie's Neighborhood Bar, he consulted James Schlickau, coowner, as to what they did with their empty bottles. The response was, "We throw them away...." They didn't mention anything about returning them to the distributor. When Rusty's Last Chance was contacted, the bartender I spoke with said that neither bottles nor cans were recycled. When I questioned the reason for the waitresses separating bottles into buckets, he explained that the weight of the bottles were too heavy for the trash bags they used. He stated that this was not for recycling purposes. Later that day a waitress was contacted and said she wasn't sure whether they recycled or not.

Even though mine was a very informal survey with no names taken, there shouldn't be discrepancies in the responses. In the case of Last Chance, I spoke with the people who take out the trash. The people who clean up and supposedly separate the cans and bottles for recycling purposes. If Last Chance does recycle both cans and bottles, why aren't their present employees aware of it? Aren't they the ones that are supposedly carrying out the policies? In the case of Charlie's, would I have gotten a more socially-acceptable answer if I would have introduced myself as a Collegian reporter? Maybe, if I would have said it was going to be on the front page of the KSU newspaper I would have gotten coinciding results.

Whether or not these bars recycle, it is still apparent that many bar owners have the same attitudes as those of Snookies. Keith Eyestone, co-owner of Snookies, states that there is no room to store the bottles for recycling. Does he realize that there is probably less room in the Riley County landfill that is scheduled to close in 1991? He is also quoted as saying that storing 80 cases of bottles some place gets to be a hassle. Boy, is he really going to be irked when he has to drive his trash to another county to dump it or pay an outlandish trash bill to have someone else drive to another county to dump it.

The bars play a huge part in this evergrowing problem. The truth is, the bars aren't evenly divided about this decision. Even if they are, is 50 percent good enough? Several Kansas City bars put in their ads "We recycle," under the assumption that the consumer cares about this. Does it matter to you as a Manhattan consumer? If it does, let people like Keith Eyestone and Ken Snook know. Eyestone made the statement, "We can always go out to the dumpster." Keith, in this day and age with the landfill problem increasing, always is running out of time.

"We're musicians," said bandmaster and Chief Warrant Officer Brian Benson, "but we have to be ready to go to war with the rest of the folks. If we deploy, hopefully our horns will come with us. If not, hopefully they will come later and not get sunk on a ship someplace.

"Then if it's not too nasty, we'll go out and play and try to make people happy," Benson said. "If they're shooting at us someplace, then we'll do our security mission for the main."

Benson said in peacetime, the 40-member band can be broken into units to act as a concert band, a stage band, a rock combo, a jazz combo, a brass quintet or a marching band. These units have performed everywhere from high schools to formal dinners.

Although most of the music the concert band plays is traditional, the style depends on the occasion, Benson said.

"For example, when we go out on the Fourth of July, we'll do a lot of patriotic-type things," he said. "For the Eisenhower concerts we've got coming up, it will be a lot of the music that he was familiar with."

The Army does place strict regulations on what type of events are appropriate for the band to play, Benson said.

"We can play for parades as long as it's not to enhance the commercial aspects of a holiday," he said. "We can't do Christmas parades or Thanksgiving Day parades such as Macy's."

Benson said among the band's favorite places to entertain are the Czech festival in Wilson and the Swedish festival in Lindsborg. "If they can tie it in as a community-relations event, like with the rodeo or the FunFest, even though these folks are going to be making some money on it someplace, that's okay," he said, "because our participation is incidental to the main event."

The band's talents don't go unnoticed by personnel at Fort Riley, said Garrison Commander Col. Gary LaGrange.

"They're a superb band," LaGrange said. "It's appropriate that they're wearing the Big Red One on their sleeves. I think they're first class, and they're probably one of the best, if not the best, in the army."

Band member Spc. Saul Del Angel said excellence is important to him.

"The Army band gives me the chance to get experience and foresight into the band field," Del Angel said. "I've learned a lot. I'm going to try to get a bachelor's if not a master's degree in performance and join a symphony."

Spc. Carlos Orr said the job of a band member is more difficult than it looks.

"Originally, I wasn't coming into the band, but my recruiter mentioned the band field to me and I auditioned and made it," Orr said. "A lot of people don't understand that it's a harder job than most people think it is. A lot of times, you work long hours and you don't have much time to spend with your family. But I enjoy it. I enjoy playing my instrument.

"Sometimes you go out and come back in and your lips are fried and chapped up from not playing for a while. It takes a lot of patience," he said. The rewards outweigh the hard work, said Sgt.

James McMahon.

"There is nowhere at the college level, the university level, nowhere will you get the musical experience or time in that you will in the Army, Air Force, Navy, ... and it's free."

'Cats in key series at Nebraska

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

To borrow from the popular summer soft drink commercial with the kid baseball player in front of the vending machine as the play-byplay announcer calls the action: "It all comes down to this.'

The end of the K-State baseball season won't come this weekend in Lincoln, Neb., but the Wildcats can take a giant step toward postseason play with victories in at least two of the four games scheduled against the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

K-State is 10-6 in Big Eight play entering the pair of afternoon doubleheaders today and Saturday at Buck Belzer Field.

Wildcat coach Mike Clark has maintained throughout the year that 12 wins will be the number that will get his team into the Big Eight Postseason Tournament for the first time since 1985, when Gary Vaught was the K-State coach.

But instead of reminding his players of the significance of winning at least two and sewing up the berth now, rather than having to do it against Oklahoma State in Stillwater, Okla., next weekend, Clark has chosen to use the old "one game at a time" theory.

The main thing right now is not to win a certain number of games," Clark said. "It's to win the one we're in at the time."

Clark realizes, however, that no team that has won at least 12 games has ever failed to make the tourney field.

And that fact alone gives the games against Nebraska, 7-9 and tied for fourth in the league, special significance.

The games against the Comhuskers will mark the second road conference series of the year for K-State, which split its road series at They're a different ballclub this Kansas in early April.

Clark said that Nebraska, which is also playing for its tournament life, will provide stiff opposition for the Wildcats.

David Hierholzer, 7-3, will throw the series opener for the Wildcats. K-State has yet to drop a lidlifter in Big Eight play, having captured the opener of each of the first four conference series. Freshman Sean Pedersen, a native of Omaha, Neb., will be making his first collegiate start in his home state in the nightcap. Pedersen, 4-4, has dropped consecutive conference starts, but he rebounded to win against Northern Colorado.

The pitching starters for Saturday's doubleheader are a bit up-inthe-air, Clark said.

Kent Hipp is scheduled to start the first game Saturday, but his status is day-to-day because of a problem in his pitching (right) elbow.

In Hipp's eight-inning relief stint against Wichita State April 26, he relied on his split-finger fastball to the degree that it hurt his elbow. He now has trouble throwing the splitter and the normal fastball, Clark said. Hipp was said to be at "about 70 percent" at practice Thursday.

The starter in the other Saturday game will depend upon the outcome of the first three games. Included on the list of possible starters are Chris Hmielewski, a normal member of the Big Eight rotation, and Dave Christensen, who was the starter and loser of the opening game of Monday's doubleheader against Southwest Missouri State.

Kauffman might buy out Fogelman

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Seven years after an ailing Ewing Kauffman sold half interest in the Kansas City Royals to Avron Fogelman, a healthy Kauffman is poised to regain full ownership from a financially sick Fogelman.

There is scant possibility, Kauffman said, of the American League club leaving Kansas City.

Kauffman Fogelman

"His financial situation has deteriorated," Kauffman said of Fogelman. "I feel sorry for the man. But he is drowning and trying to stay alive."

Fogelman, a Memphis real estate developer and devoted baseball fan, bought into the team in 1983 when Kauffman, the team founder, was thought to have serious health problems. In the past two years, Fogelman's financial situation has markedly deteriorated and Kauffman admitted their personal relationship also has soured.

"Obviously I feel different about him than I did," Kauffman said at a news conference at Royals Stadium.

Kauffman said under the proposal, which he is considering, Kauffman would loan the club $34 million and the club would then loan the money to Fogelman, who is beset by banks and other creditors. The loan would be secured by Fogelman's 50 percent interest in the club.

Fogelman would then give Kauffman an option to buy out Fogelman's interest for the outstanding balance of the loan. Kauffman said he would not require much time to make a

"Hopefully, it will be this month," he said. "Then an investment banker will be hired to receive bids. The bids will be taken by Oct. 15 and closed by Jan. 2 of next year."

At that point, the Royals would be offered for sale to the highest bidder acceptable to Major League Baseball, and Kauffman would be allowed to match the offer.

He had a quick answer when asked if he was prepared to meet "any bid." "No, sir," he said. "There may be some wild bids. If somebody came in with an outlandish bid and has the approval of the owners ... it might happen."

Under their original agreement, Fogelman has the option to purchase Kauffman's half of the club.

"He has the right to buy me out if he pays the $10 million. But there's no way he's going to do that," Kauffman said. "You're talking about hundreds of millions of dollars in real estate, plus unsecured loans without collateral." Kauffman noted that Baseball Commissioner Fay Vincent has promised not to let the team leave Kansas City. And in addition, the Royals and Kansas City Chiefs of the NFL recently signed 25-year leases, and voters in April approved a new financing measure with Jackson County guaranteeing the teams certain financial help.

It is anticipated, the Royals said in a statement, that Kauffman's option would be exercised immediately after the closing of the loan, but the actual purchase would occur later.

An acceptable bidder would have to repay the $34 million loan, as well as all amounts owed by the Royals to Kauffman, and assume all other liabilities, including the new stadium

If a bid is received by a third party, Kauffman would have the right to meet it but would not be obligated to. The closing of the sale would occur on Jan. 2, 1991. If no third-party bid is received, Kauffman would purchase Fogelman's interest on Jan. 3,

"I am anxious to provide assistance to Mr. Fogelman in a way that will ensure the continued successful presence of the Royals in Kansas City," said Kauffman, who sold the half-interest to Fogelman for $11 million. "Mr. Fogelman's proposal, necessitated by his current financial difficulties, is very onerous to me personally. But I am giving full consideration to his wishes."

Veishea provides tune-up for tracksters

By Dan Wicker Sports Reporter

It's close-out time for the K-State track and field team.

The Wildcat tracksters will end the regular-season portion of their schedule today at Ames, Iowa, in the Veishea Invitational. It will be one of only two meets left for Wildcat athletes to qualify for nationals. K-State will start its postseason May 19 with the Big Eight Championships at Norman, Okla.

Capriotti said the meet is good preparation for the upcoming conference meet. The Wildcats have traveled to the invite the last few years, winning it two years ago.

"This meet will give us a good tuneup for the Big Eight meet," Capriotti said. "I would like to end the season with a successful meet and have some good performances."

However, not all of the K-State athletes will be making the trip. Clifton Etheridge, Connie Teaberry and Joy Jones, three of the team's top scorers, will watch from the sidelines for some rest and stay out of an injury situation. Except for those three, Capriotti said most of the team will be making the road trip.

Capriotti said the meet will not only give the Wildcat athletes another chance for a national qualifying mark, but also provide them an inside glimpse at some conference rivals.

"The meet will be some very good competition for us," Capriotti said. "It will also give us a chance to see Iowa State, who is probably the team to beat."

Good weather is one prime track and field ingredient that has eluded K-State for the season. The team is hoping that the unseasonably cold weather will change to help boost performances today. "I am hoping for some good weather to help get some kids qualified for nationals. I thought we had some good performances last weekend (Penn and Drake Relays) even though the weather wasn't as good as we wanted," Capriotti said. "We have got to be careful with the cool weather. We should be OK as long as we keep everyone healthy." And keeping everyone healthy has imposed a slight problem for the team outdoors. The men have lost Charles Armstead, the top hurdler, and David Warders, a distance ace. The women have not escaped either, with the loss of two key sprinters.

"We have lost a couple of kids. It is hard to cover all the events when you lose key people," Capriotti said. "Can't lose all those people and expect to do as well as we wanted. We just need everyone else to stay healthy."

On the women's side watch for strong performances again from all-American Angie Miller, who is looking to qualify for nationals in the discus after already reaching the mark in the shot put.

For the men, Capriotti is hoping for some improvements in the middle distances. The half mile will consist of three runners from the two-mile relay team that captured the Kansas Relays title. Marcus Wright is hoping to qualify for nationals in the event while freshmen Jared Storm and Randy Helling will be looking decathlon. The women are led by Miller, who is first in the shot and discus, along with Carla Shannon, who leads the triple jump and is second in the long jump. Teaberry holds third in the high jump. Haskin and Barry are second and third in the 10,000 meters. and Haskin is third in the 5,000 meters. Joy Jones sits at third in the 400 meters, and Markeya Jones is second in the 200 meters.

Missouri gets letter from NCAA

Bietau nabs regional honor By The Associated Press

K-State's women's tennis coach Steve Bietau has been named the co-coach of the year for the Central Region of the Intercollegiate Tennis Coaches Association. He shares the honor with Brigham Young's Ann Valentine.

SPORTS BRIEFLY

Twenty universities are represented in the region, and the coach of the year is chosen by a panel of five coaches. According to Kansas men's coach Scott Perelman, a member of the voting committee, coaches of the year are selected based upon sportsmanship of the coach and the team, team performance during the most recent season and during the coach's career and contributions made by the coach to the game of tennis.

Three earn academic honor

K-State tennis player Valerie Rive and baseball players Kevin Kaufman and Jeff Ryan have been named to the Big Eight Conference All-Academic team in their respective sports. Rive, the No. 4 singles player on Coach Steve Bietau's Wildcat tennis squad, is a senior in management and held down a 3.0 grade point average last semester, Kaufman, a designated hitter for Coach Mike Clark's baseball team, maintained a 3.93 GPA as a senior in accounting, while Ryan, a catcher for the Wildcats, had a 3.79 GPA as a sopho-

COLUMBIA, Mo. - University of Missouri Athletic Director Dick Tamburo said Thursday he was relieved to finally receive an official letter of inquiry from the NCAA into the men's basketball program.

"I was pleased to get it just from the standpoint of getting the response prepared for it and getting our program moving forward. We're in the process of evaluating it right now," he said.

Officials received the official letter from the NCAA on Wednesday. The letter lists charges against the program and "officially informs you that they've looked at your program and asks you to respond accordingly," Tamburo said.

The university scheduled a news conference for Monday afternoon to distribute the letter.

The basketball program has been under investigation since February 1989, the same time Coach Norm Stewart collapsed on the team plane and later underwent cancer surgery.

Stewart recovered from his cancer surgery and led Missouri to an NCAA tournament appearance this year. Missouri lost in the first-round to Northern Iowa.

The university has six weeks to respond to the letter.

Golfers tee off in final meet

From Staff and Wire Reports GENOA, Ill. - The Oak Club of Genoa will be the site of the last regular season tournament scheduled for the K-State men's golf team. The 4th Annual Midwestern Invitational, hosted by Northern Illinois University, will begin with a 7:30 a.m. tee time today and then continue through Friday's round will consist of 36 holes, which will be followed by 18 holes on Saturday. The par 72 tournament course covers 7,004 yards. There are 19 teams scheduled to compete. Arch-rival Kansas will be there as well as other familiar foes like Michigan, Michigan State, Louisville, Toledo, Minnesota and Wisconsin. The defending team champions, the Buckeyes of Ohio State, will be on hand in attempt to retain their title.

The Wildcats that qualified for what will be their last regular season tournament are seniors Jeff Sedorcek and Todd Fowler. Also qualifying are juniors Brett Vuillemin and Bobby Donnellan as well as freshman Richard Laing. "I am struggling to find a 4th and 5th man that can post the numbers on the board," Head Coach Russ Bunker said. "I think these two (Donnellan and Fowler) can get the job done."

The Wildcats are coming off a disappointing, last-place finish at the Big Eight Championships last week.

"I am anxious to see if we can put our last dismal performance behind us and move on," Bunker said. "It is important for us to do just that and to finish the season with a strong performance."

This is the first spring tournament that Fowler has qualified for. Fowler, a native of Rockford, Ill., will hopefully be able to use his familiarity of the course to his advantage.

Last year the 'Cats placed 9th out of 15 teams at the Midwestern Invitational (Northern Illinois Huskie Classic).

Grants aid disadvantaged

By Bill Sier Collegian Reporter

Upward Bound is giving some college-bound students what they need to succeed — a head start.

Upward Bound is a federal program designed to help economically disadvantaged high school students receive a college education. It is funded by three-year renwable grants issued through the Department of Education with matching University

The K-State program serves students from Junction City, Manhattan, Westmoreland and St. George high schools. But it is not for everyone, said Reginland McGowan, director of Upward Bound.

"Of course, when you are dealing with the federal government, there must not make more than 150 percent of the federal poverty level, McGowan said. For example, a family of four could have an annual income of not more than $19,050.

college graduates in the student's immediate family.

ily with its first college graduate," McGowan said.

A student considered for the progsuccess beyond high school as well, he said. Although transcripts with good grades can be used, a marginal student can show this potential through statements or recommendations from school personnel. "The real challenge of Upward Bound is serving kids who are at tre-mendous risk," McGowan said. "Half of getting these kids to perform is helping them with their personal problems.

He said the program is available to all students who qualify. "This is not specifically designed as a minority program," McGowan The program targets students who have a poor chance of furthering their education beyond the secondary

"We represent traditionally underrepresented students," said Jamaye Despaigne, senior counsellor with the program. "We are an academic program, trying to get kids into college.'

Because Upward Bound is a federal program, it is not intended to attract students to K-State, McGowan

"It is not a goal of the program to recruit for K-State," he said. "Our goal is to get the kids into a seconram must further show potential for dary program, where ever they may want to go."

Whether intentional or not, however, McGowan said that there are currently 25-30 participants of the K-State program attending here. And next fall, there will be more.

"We have 12 graduates this year," McGowan said, "and out of those, seven have received admissions letters to K-State."

In addition to providing financial support, the program also helps students prepare for college by exposing them to a collegiate lifestyle.

"The intent of the summer program is to give these kids exposure to college life," he said.

Students participating in the summer program live in dorms, eat at the food service centers and attend activites and classes throughout the day, McGowan said. However, the students must participate in the activities in order to receive a $5-per-week stipend.

Participants also receive one-half of one credit towards high school graduation.

Graduating high school seniors can further participate in the Bridge Program through Upward Bound, McGowan said. These seniors can enroll in up to six hours of summer school at K-State, giving themselves a head start on required college classes.

"We have no restriction on what they take," McGowan said, "We usually encourage them to take something like English composition or some other class we know they are going to need."

In addition to providing students with a glimpse of college life and the chance to attend, Upward Bound also provides a chance for them to go to Washington, D.C., with the Presidential Classroom.

"We just sent two students there earlier this year," Despaigne said. The first student selected is chosen based solely on his or her total grade point, average through the first semester of the senior year, Despaigne said.

This provides them with an incentive to do well all the way through high school," she said.

The second student is selected by an essay competition that is judged, in part, by the other students in the program. The four finalists are required to answer questions about government from administrators and other students. One finalist is selected to go based on the quality of his or her answers.

Once in Washington, the students participate in several activities.

Students form political group

Worldwide organization expands with educational computer networks

By Bill Sier

A new wind is blowing across the college and university campuses of the world, and it had its beginnings at K-State.

Southwind is a political organization established at the University. Its international headquarters is located off-campus in the Ecumenical Christian Ministries building. But it is not, as its president points out, a religious organization.

'We use the ECM building because it is convenient to where we all live," said Lee Hallagin, freshman in chemical engineering and president of Southwind. "It provides us with a mailing address."

Southwind's name is derived from the Sioux Indian word "konza," which means "people of the south wind." The name "Kansas" is based on this word.

Southwind is already an international organization, with about 150 members in four countries. Its rapid growth is due in part to computer networking, Hallagin said.

Michael Roach, executive director of Southwind and sophomore in mechanical engineering, said he was having a discussion about three months ago over the BITNET computer network with Ken Sivaraman, a student at George Mason University in Fairfax, Va., which lead to the formation of the organization.

There was a channel where a lot of politics was being discussed," he said.

In the course of the conversation, Roach and Sivaraman discovered they agreed on several points about education and other issues, Roach said. They decided to form a new political organization.

'For quite a while, I hadn't been intersted in politics," Roach said. "Then, I became interested in changing how our world works.'

Roach told several of his friends on campus about the new organization, said Paul Davidson, sophomore undecided and public relations representative for Southwind. Some of them, including Hallagin, now comprise the core of the local group and serve as an interim board of directors and officers for the organization.

Other students and individuals learned of the organization via educational computer networks.

Roach and Sivaraman did not come up with the name for their idea in that initial coversation, Davidson said.

"We came up with the name here, and told Ken about it," he said. "He liked it, so we kept it."

Southwind's causes cover a wide range of interests, from the environment to education to America's declining role as a world leader, Roach said.

"We see these problems as interrelated," he said, "You can't have good research without good education. And we can't correct the environment without good research.

These problems are like an arrow in our side," he said. "It hurts to pull them out, but we must do it to survive."

Although they consider themselves a political organization, the members of Southwind do not hold any one particular political ideology, and prefer to back candidates based on their positions on issues rather than their affiliation, Hallagin said.

"We want to remain a nonpartisan, non-profit organization," he said. "We hope to get all organizations working toward a common goal working together."

Southwind members don't want to replace existing organizations that are working on some of the same problems, Davidson

"The object is to get the narrow spectrum groups into a broad coalition, with each group retaining its own identity," he said.

Of the 150 current members, 45 are at K-State. The remainder are spread throughout the other schools and individuals that were contacted through the computer networks, Davidson said.

Tour to include area art galleries

By Samantha Farr Collegian Reporter

The Department of Art is sponsoring a museum tour of Impressionist art today for students, faculty and community members.

The focus of the trip is the collaborative exhibit at the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art in Kansas City, Mo.

The exhibit features 85 paintings and sculptures by 21 of the most celebrated Impressionist and Post-Impressionist artists, including Monet, Renoir and Van Gogh, Gary Woodward, associate professor of art and head of the art department, said other stops will be at the Mulvane Art Center at Washburn University and the Spencer Museum at the University of Kansas.

The Mulvane Art Center is currently showing "Mexico Nueve," an exhibit highlighting nine printmakers from the Tamaron Institute, he

A collection of prints gathered by Richard Booman from 1950 to 1970 and a photography show of pieces drawn from the museum's collection dated 1920 to 1940 are featured at the Spencer Museum, he said.

The trip costs $8, including transportation, gallery admission and a snack, Woodward said.

More than 65 people are signed up for the trip, he said. "We expect this will be our most successful trip so far," he said. Woodward said he hopes students who are not art majors will take advantage of this trip and future trips. "We make attempts to get non-art students to participate in the trips," he said. "We feel that it is our mission to get students to art centers that can afford to have large exhibits, which is not an opportunity on campus."

The art department offers at least one or two museum tours each year, Woodward said.

Tour scheduled

Bike routes established to recognize pioneer homesites, Flint Hills area

By Samantha Farr Collegian Reporter

Local historical spots, including pioneer homesites, will be featured Saturday in the Memory Lane Tour 1990, the first historical bicycle tour of the Flint Hills.

"Each rider will be provided with a map that tells them about the history behind the area of the routes," said Peg Kowalczyk, former educational coordinator for UFM. "The tour has the benefit for individuals to become more aware of the history of our area."

The tour is open to anyone interested in discovering the history of the Manhattan area.

Terri Peters, senior in marketing, said riders will start at Anneberg Park in Manhattan and can choose from three historical bike routes, according to their interest and level of conditioning. The first route, "Keats Classic," is a 13-mile distance. The second route, "Riley Rider," will cover 30 miles. The third route, "Turn of the (Metric) Century," is a 66-mile distance.

Peters said local businesses will donate food for the riders. Advance registration fees for the tour are $12 per family member and $15 per individual. The fee will be $17 per family member and $21 per individual registering on the day of the event.

More than 130 riders are expected to participate in the event, Peters said. In addition to local interest, riders from surrounding counties and states have registered for the tour.

Kowalczyk said the idea for the tour got off the ground in October. "We thought it was a good way to get K-State students involved in UFM activities," she said. "The tour gives students and the community the opportunity to get started in bicycle touring and view beautiful Flint Hills history. The purpose is to get people out there on their bicycles. It's nice to pull people together from all over Kansas to get or keep them interested in bike touring."

Kowalczyk said ride leaders will be travel along each route to answer questions, assist with unexpected problems and offer encouragement to riders. The leaders are qualified individuals who know basic bicycle repair and have past touring experience.

Also, employees from the Pathfinder will conduct a complimentary mechanical check of bicycles before the tour begins for riders, she said.

"These checks are just to let the owner be more aware of the condition of their bicycle," she said. "In addition, there will be sag wagons along the routes to help those who may need it."

Riders who registered earlier in the spring have also had the opportunity to participate in pre-ride workshops on sports nutrition, bicycling basics, touring tips and fixing flat tires, Kowalczyk said.

"With the workshops, we can provide an opportunity for people who are new to touring to feel more comfortable with the tour and to educate them a little bit,"

"We hope the event is a really positive riding experience for all participants - those who make it goal just to make the 13 miles and those who are in training and want to make the 66 miles in a certain amount of time," she said.

Grad school opens doors

Further schooling broadens job flexibility, salary rates

By Amy D. Hadlock Collegian Reporter

Once a bachelor's degree is earned, many doors are open to the college graduate. One of the many options open to the student is graduate school," said Bobette McGaughey, assistant to the dean for graduate recruitment. "Sometimes students think that graduate school is a good decision, but not for them. It is important to realize that graduate school is obtainable for anyone who is willing to take the time and make the necessary commitments."

Although graduate school requires commitment, it does offer benefits. "Graduate school provides more opportunities to the person," McGaughey said. "These opportuni-ties range from salary increase, recognition in your field, more flexibility in your career, being able to make your own decisions and job

Even though all of these benefits may sound great, graduate school is not for everyone.

"Graduate school isn't for everyone," McGaughey said. "It takes intelligence, initiative, self-discipline, a questioning mind and the ability to commit time and finances. It is also important to be interested in research and the possibility of teaching."

Cost is often a deterrent when considering graduate school, McGaughey said. Assistantships and fellowships offered by the University can help pay for graduate school. Loans are also usually available.

"When thinking of the cost, it is important to think of your money as an investment," she said.

People attend graduate school at different times, depending on the timetable best suited to the program.

"Some departments require that you continue with your master's degree right after you receive your ba-chelor's degree," McGaughey said. "This is true in the scientific fields, such as math and physics. Other departments like you to go out and actually work in your profession for a while and then come back."

Iain Murray, graduate student in hotel, restaurant and institution management, went back to college to earn his master's degree after finishing his bachelor's. He is now working on his

"I felt that it was important for me to wait because I needed a break," Murray said. "Being a student is hard work. I feel that the student has to really want to continue on with school. If their heart is not in it, they may not be able to finish. It is also hard to come back after you have had a good job and be a student again, where you have to answer to others."

People attend graduate school for variety of reasons.

"I chose to go to graduate school because I felt that the job that was offered to me with my B.S. wasn't what I wanted. I wanted more of a career," said Dan Jones, graduate student in animal science. "One of the hardest things about going to graduate school is time management. Trying to manage time between class and research is very difficult." K-State's graduate school offers many different programs.

"Right now there are 60 different master's programs offered and 42 doctoral programs," McGaughey said. "Each program varies in the time it takes to complete."

To be admitted to graduate school, students must apply to the department of their choice for admission. The department will review the application. If the person is admitted, the application is then sent to the graduate school, where it is reviewed

A 3.0 grade point average is required for admission to graduate school. Students with lower GPAs may be accepted on probation.

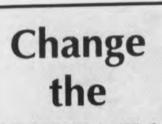

"Graduate school is not only important for seniors, but freshmen, sophomores and juniors," McGaughey Troup said. "I am not aware of any errors.'

Gradert said in his decision that testimony from professionals and friends of the mother did not merit admission into the trial as evidence.

"There is virtually nothing that provides adequate indication of reliability beyond the mere making of the statements themselves, obviously insufficient basis," Gradert wrote.

Gradert said he based his decision on several issues, including comments given by Sydney Smith of the Menninger Foundation of Topeka.

The Menninger Foundation had conducted a home study of the family during divorce custody proceedings in 1988. Smith, a counselor with the Menninger Foundation, was a member of the evaluation team that performed the study.

"Dr. Smith's evaluation establishes that (the mother) is a prime candidate for fabrication of allegations of sexual abuse, perhaps even unintentionally," Gradert wrote. The Menninger reports were "unable to substantiate any claim of sexual Coyner said, however, that Dr. William Logan, head of the evaluation team, testified that the mother did not fabricate allegations.

The mother of the children and Gareis said Gradert took all the information in his decision from one or two lines of the 100-page Menninger

"Judge Gradert failed to recognize the defendant's (evaluation in the) Menninger report, or the positive aspects of mine," the mother said.

During the parents' divorce proceedings on Oct. 23, Logan said nothing indicated that the twins had been coerced in any way by their mother. He testified there was no evidence of the mother emotionally, physically or verbally abusing the

"Obviously the judge is trying to make decisions in areas he knows nothing about," the mother said. "Apparently, the judge felt that anything the professionals said was garbage. He placed no value on what anybody

Coyner said Gradert substituted his speculation for the experience of professionals when interpreting the actions of the twins.

Coyner referred specifically to a passage in the decision where Gradert wrote, "It has been this court's personal experience, not only with his own children, but with grandchildren of which he has three, that it is not at all unusual for children to hug and kiss even an unrelated adult with whom they feel close."

Brad Fuller, from Beloit and cochairman of Save the Heartland, said the group he represents has a small voice compared to the business interests surrounding Fort Riley. He said the formation of a large coordinating body would help give those opposed to expansion a greater voice.

Fuller said all area farmers should be concerned, not just those with land in one of the proposed expansion sites. The Army's last expansion at Fort Carson, Colo. resulted in the acquisition of 200,000 acres of land, which did not include any of the 82,000 acre sites they initially proposed, he said.

The Army has already announced the need for a buffer zone that will increase the size of any expansion to 100,000 acres, Fuller said.

Steve Baccus, of Minneapolis and chairman of Save Rural Kansas, said people in the Minneapolis area were unaware of the Army's expansion plans until land in Ottawa County was targeted for possible acquisition.

Since its formation, Baccus said his group has been active in gaining public exposure through television ads, radio talk shows, public hearings and letters to newspapers.

QUESTION: How will the 6th/7th grade combination work? Are the ages of these children compatible with being housed in the same facility?

ANSWER: Sixth and seventh graders are very similar in their physical, emotional, social, and academic needs.

The proposed bond package addresses each of those characteristics in a positive way. The program in the new 6-7 school will provide a variety of exploratory opportunities for every child which will

The physical and social growth, which is so extraordinary at this age, will be addressed through housing students in two clusters of 125 for a house of 250. This will allow students to socialize with a relatively large number of students but at the same time will provide a small, home group to address the sense of belonging.

Another important issue is the adjustment to a secondary school which the program addresses nicely. The 125 students in a cluster will be assigned to the same five teachers (math, social studies, science, language arts, foreign languages) but will have the opporunity to move to exploratory classes in those same groups. This will provide students practice in moving from one place to another but not with the entire

Legislature ends wrap-up session without tax bill

Hayden's No. 1 issue of 1990 fails passage; restrictions on abortions meet disapproval

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - The gavels banged at the midnight hour Saturday to close down the 1990 session of the Kansas Legislature, a session that will be remembered more for what it didn't accomplish than the major breakthroughs it did achieve.

It didn't provide any financial relief to property taxpayers, many of whom experienced large increases in their 1989 tax bills as a result of reappraisal and classification. It didn't enact any legislation to restrict abortions, despite the ballyhoo over the U.S.

Property tax relief Restrictions on abortions Changes in state ethics laws

Supreme Court's ruling in the Webster case

It didn't make any sweeping reforms in the state's ethics laws.

It did pass a mandatory 40-year sentence for certain murders as an alternative to capital punishment; enacted major overhauls of the state's system for caring for the mentally ill and its adoption laws; allowed unlimited branch banking; required state government to maintain an adequate balance in its bank account; imposed a spending lid of sorts on local government; passed most of a package idential primary election for 1992. And lawmakers put on the November election ballot what could produce the most farreaching change in control of public education in Kansas in a quarter of a century. Voters will decide whether to keep an elected state Board of Education in charge or return that power to the Legislature and perhaps have an appointed board in the future.

will be remembered as the one in which a stalemated Legislature never could find tax reduction or classification revision plans that enough lawmakers could support to get them

When the Senate adjourned the longest wrap-up session in history at 11:55 p.m. Saturday and the House followed at 12:08 a.m. Sunday, the Legislature went home without passing any major property tax relief

What Gov. Mike Hayden and legislative leaders identified all during the regular 90-day session and the 10-working day wrapup session as the No. 1 issue of 1990 was never resolved.

The last effort to pass a tax reduction plan failed Saturday afternoon in the Senate. Seventeen senators - four short of the required majority - voted for a plan that would have increased the sales tax a half cent and raised corporation incomes taxes a quarter percent.

The $117 million that would have raised would have been given to local school districts to reduce school property taxes about 16 percent.

It was the fifth time the Senate had rejected a tax rollback bill in the past month.

The deadlock over property tax reduction resulted from a philosophical difference between House and Senate. House members wanted a broadly-based tax increase mix to finance a tax rollback, while a majority of senators preferred to raise it all basically from the sales tax.

The final attempt to adopt a resolution submitting to voters a constitutional amendment that would have revamped the state's property classification system came Friday. The House fell nine votes shy of the required twothirds majority needed to approve a plan that lowered assessment rates for both residential and commercial property.

Senate refusal to include restoration of business inventories to the tax rolls in some fashion doomed all amendment proposals to failure. The House wanted those inventories, exempted from taxation in the 1986 amendment that created the classification system, put back on the tax rolls, at least for a few years, because of the tax shifts their exemption caused.

Despite the failures on the tax relief front, Gov. Mike Hayden said he wasn't likely to call a special session of the Legislature, which will take final, ceremonial adjournment on June 1.

He vowed to propose new property tax relief measures to the 1991 session if he is reelected in November.

Hayden got two major pieces of legislation he wanted Saturday night, a bill requiring the Legislature to maintain at least a $100 million balance in the state general fund at the end of each fiscal year, and a budget-cutting bill that trimmed $44 million from the 1991 budget to ensure a $100 million balance at the end of fiscal year 1991.

The Legislature went home after funding a $5.1 billion total state budget, of which $2.49 billion will come from the state general fund. Budget Director Michael O'Keefe projected a general fund balance of $101.1 million at To taxpayers upset over increases in their the end of next fiscal year, which would be

Senators decide not to decide on alcohol

By Kirk Caraway

Student Senate decided not to decide Thursday night on the issue of recommending that alcohol sales and consumption be allowed at KSU Stadium and referred the resolution to committee for more study in its last meeting of the semester.

The resolution was sent to the Student Affairs and Social Services standing committee to iron out details on how a proposed change in alcohol policy should be carried out.

"In order to get a fair hearing on this bill, we need to make specific recommendations on how to implement it," said John Ryan, education senator.

The resolution, in its current form, would recommend to the administration changes in the University alcohol policy to allow 3.2 percent beer sales during football games and for a section of the stadium parking lot to be set aside for tailgate parties.

"You have to realize that the drinking laws at this University are hypocritical," said Barry Beck, business senator. "They are made to accommodate alumni, not students."

Beck and other senators pointed out that alcohol is allowed in Bramlage Coliseum Legends Room and the football office Big Eight Room before games, and that rules against drinking in the parking lot are generally not enforced for alumni.

"You can drive through the west side of the parking lot and see little wet bars set up everywhere," said David McIntyre, engineering senator.

Senate also rejected special allocation requests to cover travel expenses for Ms. Ro-deo K-State and the Alpha Epsilon Delta Pre-Health Professional Honor Society. Several senators spoke out about the number of special allocations for travel that Senate has approved this semester.

"Read my lips, no new trips," McIntyre said. "I'm getting tired of being considered a travel agent. I don't think we should be funding trips left and right."

Another special allocation for travel expenses for the Phi Beta Lambda business organization was withdrawn by Finance Committee because the group had not received an answer to a funding request from the Business College Council.

Student Body President Todd Johnson reported to Senate that he had vetoed a bill passed last week dealing with the selection procedure for Associated Students of Kansas Policy Council delegates. In a written statement issued to senators, Johnson stated the legislation is inconsistent with the proposed State ASK constitution because it cut out the role of the student body president in the selection process.

Also approved by Senate was a resolution commending Ray Dempsey Jr., senior in industrial engineering, for being named Distinguished Fellow by the National Society of

Kremlin rejects independence

Latvia secedes from Soviet Union; expects economic sanctions to follow

By The Associated Press

RIGA, U.S.S.R. - Latvian politicians said on Sunday they were steeling themselves for strikes, protests and an economic blockade now that the Kremlin has reportedly rejected their declaration of independence.

Latvia's Communist Party chief, Alfreds Rubiks, said Saturday that Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev told him by telephone he could not accept Latvia's secession and may impose sanctions against the Baltic republic.
"We understand the situation in Latvia will be very tough, even critical, this summer," said Peteris Lakis, one of the leaders of the Latvian People's Front, which engineered Friday's declaration.

Anatoly Alexeyev, head of the Interfront Movement of non-Latvian residents, predicted that the Soviets would start an economic blockade

Alexeyev, a prominent opponent of secession, said a labor group representing about 140,000 workers has called a general strike for May 15 to protest the declaration of independence.

The neighboring Baltic republic of Lithuania declared independence on March 11, and Gorbachev responded by sending Soviet troops to seize some buildings and imposing economic sanctions, including an oil and natural gas embargo.

The third Baltic republic, Estonia, last month announced its intention to secede but stopped short of declaring independence and set no date for leaving the Soviet Union. The Kremlin has imposed no sanctions on

The Soviet Union forcibly annexed the three Baltic republics in 1940. They began campaigning for independence shortly after Gorbachev began his reforms, and he has offered them a greater say in economic and political decisions but not secession itself.

Of Latvia's 2.6 million residents, 53 percent are ethnic Latvians and 33 percent ethnic Russians. Many of the non-Latvians, especially Russians, oppose secession.

"This was a step into the dark," Alexeyev said. "Nobody knows where we are going." Alexeyev, a Russian, said his family has been living in what is now Latvia for 200

Thousands of anti-independence protesters plan to gather Wednesday during the celebration of Victory Day, the defeat of Nazi Germany in World War II, said Viktors Alksnis, a member of parliament who opposed the declaration.

He said he had expected Gorbachev's tough reaction after Latvia's Supreme Soviet parliament voted for independence instead of considering the Kremlin's offer of "special status" in a revamped Soviet federation.

"No self-respecting government will hold talks with rebels," Alexeyev said in an interview. "Our politicians decided to beat their fists on the table first, and then try to talk."

But Lakis said he suspected Rubiks may have exaggerated the harshness of Gorbachev's stand and that he believed the Kremlin would open talks within several months.

Gorbachev will be forced to negotiate because the only way he could bring Latvia to its knees would be to impose an economic blockade accompanied by a military crackdown, Lakis said.

He said the People's Front and the government had not received any official response from Gorbachev concerning the declaration of independence.

Students seize headquarters

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) - President Roh Tae-woo on Monday appealed to the nation to reject the "road toward chaos." But even as he spoke, radical students armed with firebombs and pipes seized the governing party's headquarters.

Plainclothes police firing tear gas recaptured the building 10 minutes after the takeover, arresting the students. One woman was led away with blood dripping from her nose and mouth. Windows were broken and furniture smashed in the takeover, but no damage estimate was immediately available. "Right now we are in a difficult time," Roh, flanked by his Cabinet ministers, told a nationwide television audience. "We are on a crossroads where the country can either be on a road toward progress or fall into a road toward chaos." Roh, whose governing party has been losing popularity, said labor unrest, land speculation, crime and eroding confidence in the economy were problems that all must work to solve.

"This is the time to decide the fate of the nation," he said. The opposition Party for Peace and Democracy warned Monday that South Korea "faces a very dangerous national crisis that threatens the overall basis of democracy."

Officer denies diverting guns

JERUSALEM (AP) - A former Israeli army officer wanted by Colombia on charges of training drug cartel gunmen denied Sunday that he helped divert a shipment of Israeli-made weapons to a Colombian drug lord.

Colombian authorities discovered a cache of Israeli-made Uzi machine guns and other weapons during a raid in February on a ranch owned by Gonzalo Rodriguez Gacha, who died in a gun battle with police in December 1989.

After the weapons were found, Colombia filed a strong diplomatic protest with Israel. Israeli officials responded that the weapons were part of a shipment intended for the Caribbean island nation of Antigua and Barbuda.

On Sunday, the Israeli Defense Ministry issued a statement saying Israel only sold weapons to sovereign nations and approved arms shipments only after receiving guarantees about their end use. "We have no information on how the weapons were passed to private hands in Colombia," the ministry statement said.

KU votes against ROTC

The Senate, which is composed of two-thirds faculty members and one-third students, on Thursday approved the proposal to not count ROTC courses for credit. The proposal needs to be ratified by Chancellor Gene Budig.

The proposal would first apply to graduates in 1995 and would be void if ROTC policy concerning scholarships and commissions were brought into compliance with the university's anti-discrimination policies.

The Senate also passed a motion to ban ROTC from holding commissioning ceremonies on university property until the issue

Man killed in police chase

KANSAS CITY, Kan. (AP) - A 23-year-old man was killed Sunday morning when he drove into a Union Pacific train while being chased by police, officials said.

Gregg Jones of Kansas City, Kan., was pronounced dead at Bethany Medical Center after his car rammed a train in the city, said Wanda Tackett, communications operator for the Kansas Highway Patrol.

Jones was wanted on a felony warrant in Wyandotte County for distribution of cocaine, she said.

The chase began in Merriam about 2:45 a.m. after Jones ran a stop sign. Merriam police Sgt. Syd Tubbs said he chased Jones at speeds reaching 75 mph.

Authorities called off the chase about one mile before the railroad track because they could see the train approaching, po-

Authorities said Jones ignored the well-lighted crossing, which had the crossing arm down, and he made no attempt to stop.

Solo jump ends in power lines

LYONS (AP) - An 18-year-old Wichita woman on her first solo parachute jump landed on high-voltage power lines but wasn't seriously hurt, police said Sunday.

Jennifer Rackham landed on the lines just east of the Lyons-Rice County Airport about 6 p.m. Saturday, Rice County Undersheriff Harlan Brown said.

"When we got there, she was hanging on the cross bar of the pole," Brown said. "She was pretty shaken up."

Brown said Rackham, who was jumping with the Oz Parachute Club, was rescued by crews using a fire ladder after about 15 minutes hanging on the lines.

She was not shocked by electricity, but she suffered other minor injuries, Brown said.

Rackham was in fair condition at a Wichita hospital Sunday night, a hospital official said.

Plasma collection to start at facility

By The Collegian Staff

A new medical facility will open in Manhattan near the end of July, but it won't be a doctor's office or a clinic.

A plasma collection facility will be one of eight in the Midwest, joining others in Lawrence and Lincoln, Neb. North American Biologicals Inc. is the independent company opening the center.

Kurt Mortensen, who will manage the facility, said giving plasma is not the same as giving blood. When plasma is donated, red blood cells are returned to the donor's body, and the plasma is restored on its own within 48 hours.

Wanda Svoboda, manager of the Lincoln center, said because the red blood cells are replaced, a donor can give up to two times every seven days. Each donation takes about one hour, and donors are paid about $15.

Mortensen said there will be six donor rooms in the center equipped with television sets to give the donors something to do. He said the plasma equipment looks similar to a dialysis machine, and the center is fully automated.

Svoboda said donors will receive a free physical and tips and literature on how to stay healthy. She said people with mononucleosis and allergies are good donors also because the plasma from their blood can be used for specialty programs. This plasma is worth $50

The plasma is not sold directly to hospitals because it has to be transformed by other companies into a substance that can be injected. It is used for treatment of hemophilia, shock, burns, open-heart surgery, smallpox, tetanus and rabies and in developing antibodies to combat serious diseases.

Svoboda said the center hopes to hire some University students. She said there will be up to 20 employees along with a physician and a registered nurse.

There are 30 plasma collection centers across the United States, all of which are regulated and licensed by the Food and Drug Administration. Collegian advertising has what

USD 383 teachers want increase, restructure

By Tim Clopton Collegian Reporter

Teachers in USD 383 are negotiating for an increase in base salaries and a restructured system of salary increases.

A proposal submitted to the board of education three weeks ago called for a $2,000 increase in base wages and a $25 pay increase for each level of education the teacher has attained and for each year of experience.

"We feel like the base salary for beginning teachers is too low," said Sara Martinson, special education teacher at Marlatt and Amanda Arnold schools and member of the teachers' negotiating team. "We are below the national level in average salaries. Beginning teachers need more money."

The national average for teachers' salaries is about $31,000, according to the May-June 1990 issue of NEA Today. The average for Kansas teachers is about $28,000, the publi-osed increase would set the starting salary at

The first proposal was rejected by the school board, and a counter-proposal will be offered Tuesday, said Dave Mickey, board of education negotiator.

Mickey said he could not comment on the counter-proposal.

"We have met several times and discussed the proposals," he said. "We have come to a consensus on some of the issues, but we still have to negotiate some of them."

Three issues that are still being negotiated are salaries, reimbursement of unused sick leave and length of contract, Mickey said.

The proposed salary schedule is set up as a vertical and horizontal stair step system, Martinson said. Vertical steps are achieved with each year of experience and horizontal steps are for each level of education the teacher has attained. The $25 raise for each Martinson said teachers in USD 383 make creases currently used, she said. step would do away with the percentage in-

Northview School returns to normal

By Laura Scroggins Collegian Reporter

Northview Elementary School Principal Dan Yunk looked like he was dressed for Hollywood Friday in his conservative navy suit, suspenders with palmtrees and a multi-colored, striped tie.

Yunk was being filmed by the crew of the MacNeil/Lehrer production company, which was making a documentary of four elementary schools in America, including Northview.

The crew packed up and left Friday, and life at the school turned back to normal. The filming of the PBS documentary began 'April 30.

MacNeil/Lehrer correspondent Roger Mudd interviewed parents, teachers and students at the beginning of the week. Yunk said Mudd commented on how well the school was run. Mudd made the comment that he had never been in a building where the hallways were as serene and calm as the school, Yunk said.

Mudd spoke with five children in Rene Maule's fourth grade class, a panel of teachers, the president of the Riley County Parent Teacher Organization and several

"(The kids) really did well. The first day I could tell they were conscious of the camera. But after that they were really normal," Yunk said.

Yunk said Mudd was a comfortable person who made him feel at ease.

Abortion, sex education interrelated

ing to the Surgeon General, countless other doctors and my mom, that is the most healthy way to live. In the food world, pretty much everything is all right to eat if it is taken in moderation.

The same is true with politics. Given any major political issue, people seem to either want something to happen all the time or they want that same thing to never happen.

Take abortion, for instance. Yeah, right -I am a male, and can never know what it is like to be pregnant. Some feel that no male should have an opinion on abortion, but that is another argument. I have sat on my hands for a long time and said nothing about abortion, listening to the debate rage on.

Abortion is one of those sensitive issues that seem to have no right or wrong answer. But that is because no group - at least not the most vocal groups - takes the issue in moderation. The problem is that abortion is not simply a yes-or-no issue.

It is a situational issue. But the situations in which abortion is OK can only be determined after sex education is required in schools.

There are the anti-choicers who are really anti-abortion-no-matter-what-the-reasoners. They feel that abortion is wrong in any case and should be made illegal. They say over and over that a zygote, fetus or baby is verything in moderation. Accord- alive from the time of conception. To kill an unborn baby at any time during pregnancy is to murder a human being. This human is a victim and, what is more, has no say in the

> Then there are the pro-choicers who similarly are really abortion-is-OK-for-anyreason-ers. These people feel any time a woman wants to have an abortion she should be granted that wish. Rape is a time that a woman would not want a baby, much less the offspring of the rapist. Teen-age pregnancy results in a family that is not emotionally or financially ready for the responsibilities of raising a child. Any accidental child will suffer - either because its family cannot fully support it, or because it will always be regarded as an accident.

> Neither of the two groups seems to be able to see the issue in moderation. For them, it is either one or the other, but nothing in > Abortion should not be banned across the board, but then it should not be made a completely free decision, either. Abortion should be legalized, but only under certain instances. Each situation should be fully evaluated, and a decision should be made based on that

As examples, abortion should be allowed when the mother is unfit to carry a baby, when the pregnancy is from rape and at certain times when the family or mother cannot financially support another child. Likewise, abortion should not be allowed for the sake of convenience or for pregnancy resulting from back-seat bopping.

These examples illustrate the necessity for taking abortion in moderation, but they will not work unless everyone has been educated

Granted, abortion means the death of a living person. But some women find out too late after conception - that they are too weak to support a fetus or, for some other reason, unable to give birth without seriously endangering their own lives. Sometimes having a baby means the death of two human beings.

It is hard, if not impossible, to state whether the mother's life or the baby's life is more important. But even if the mother died during pregnancy and the baby was saved, the child would not have a mother or would have to hope that it was cute enough for adoption — a risky gamble at best.

Rape is an instance that abortion may be desired for obvious reasons: the mother would be forced to remember the rape as long as the child lived. The child, on the other hand, would always have to know that it was the result of a rape and might also suffer from being regarded as such.

Abortion for the sake of convenience is wrong. Either the mother or the father thinks that it would just be less hassle to get rid of it now, rather than having to deal with adoption or child care. Perhaps the parents thought at first that they wanted a child, but now, oh, they guess not.

One-night-stand accidents are another instance in which abortion should not be allowed. Everyone who has sex should be prepared to deal with the consequences.

Both having a child and having sex for fun must be informed decisions. If there is any doubt a child might not be wanted in the future, the baby should never have been conceived or sex should never have been had.

The issues of convenience and fooling around are where the whole mess gets confusing. What if the couple in the back seat never realized the particular activity leads to babies? Some people actually believe the toiletseat theory, and others simply have no idea

Also, what happens when two teenagers are fooling around, perfectly aware of the risk of pregnancy, but cannot afford to correctly raise a child?

hat is where sex education comes in. Abortion and sex education are as intertwined as strands of rope. Until that is accepted, the abortion debate is

From first grade until college, sex education must be made an integral part of the nation's educational system. A different class should be given each year. Children, teenagers and college students must be forced to learn the realities and consequences of sex, methods of birth control and methods of avoiding sex (regarding both rape and unsure

Students must also be taught the trials, expenses and everything else associated with raising a child.

Lastly, grade school and high school kids must get at least a 'B' in each year's course to move on, and college students must get at least a 'B' in their sex classes to graduate. It is one thing to be told about sex, another entirely to learn.

When everyone in the nation knows about sex, then we can finally decide how to moderate abortion.

Show consideration before leaving school

The end of the semester is finally here. Students are free to go home, leave that old apartment or room and start partying. After finals are over, there's not a care in the world, except maybe getting to work on time.

Well, not quite.

What should students do with that eight-foot sofa, the trusty bean-bag chair or the TV? There is no way to take the sofa home, the bean-bag is boring, and the TV has GPA destroyer.

What should one do with the cat, the fish or the bird? They were pals, but the parents have said they will not let any varmints in the house. Besides, animals are a pain to care for, anyway.

write everything off as a loss and throw it away; take the pets to the pound or release them in a field.

Not so fast. There are better uses for furniture and appliances than throwing them away. Simply dumping animals in a field is cruel. Taking a pet to the pound is like writing it a death sentence.

Instead of throwing furniture away, owners should donate it to a charity. Community services such as American Red Cross, Housing proven itself to be a very efficient Authority and United Way are listed on page 33 of the Manhattan phone directory.

Pet owners, if classified advertising proves futile, can call the Pet Hotline at (913) 456-2592. A short, long-distance phone call is not much more money to spend on a Obviously, the best thing to do is friend - but dumping an animal or taking it to the pound is cruelty.

Let wars resume

In regard to the article in Thursday's Collegian, "Staff Cracks Down on Pillow Fighting," a number of facts have been omitted and misstated, especially those given by David McIntyre. Firstly, the Pillow Wars were cleared through our hall staff and director David Yoder, with opposition from David McIntyre and a few other resident assistants.

Secondly, the alleged safety concerns that McIntyre seems to fret over were discussed in negotiations with staff, and rules were set up by the participants. Yoder himself came to speak with some of the involved parties and said after speaking with us, seeing the rules of the war and talking with some of the staff, that he had little worry about safety or, for that matter, property damage.

Thirdly, McIntyre states that the staff in the hall has been trying to catch the participants during a fight, but that it was difficult. At the last pillow fight, I counted no less than five RAs and SAs, many of whom said afterward that it was the funniest thing they ever saw and wished they could participate. There was also another incident in which McIntyre himself followed us as we prepared to fight, but again, it must have been difficult to stop.

The simple fact of the matter is, nothing is mentioned in the Marlatt Hall handbook about pillow fights. The only legitimate complaint McIntyre can have, then, is noise. Oops, wrong again, pillow wars are not allowed after 11:30 p.m., by our own accord. We have done everything in our power to respect the rights of the residents who do not want to participate, but obviously this is not enough for McIntyre.

Finally, the pillow wars are not dying down because of finals or staff intervention, but simply because the other participating floors have been beaten into submission. For any history majors who may be interested in ancient Rome, Marlatt Hall has become a living example of Pax Romana, peace through power. The seat of power is located in the basement, and we deal out mercy or vengeance as we see fit. Let the wars resume!

Action 'elitist'

Now wait a minute here. As a former student senator, I often have the opportunity to stick up for Student Senate when it is being ridiculed in various classes. I always say that although there are some ass---- in Senate, overall it is a body of conscientious, hardworking people who are more concerned with helping K-State than with obtaining special privileges for themselves.

Taking this into account, imagine my surprise when, Thursday night, I asked a policeman why part of the K-State Union parking lot had been blocked off, and he replied that it was being saved for the "Student Governing Association function" that night. In other words, Student Senate.

When the leaders of student government decide that they should have the right to reserve for themselves choice spaces in the busiest parking lot on campus (as evidenced by the fact that it is necessary to reserve spaces in order to get one), I think our student government is becoming just a wee bit elitist. I was a senator during the fall and I walked from my house at 1019 Houston for every meeting. I seriously doubt any of the present senators have too much farther to walk than I did, so I don't buy the argument that it is impossible for them to get to the meetings unless they have reserved spaces in which to

What really galls me is that our student leaders (who, during their campaigns, are safety) kept two policemen occupied from 6 to 7 p.m. just so they wouldn't have to hunt for parking spaces. Surely those two policemen could have spent their time doing something a little more productive.

Alcohol dangerous

No. No. No. We do not need alcohol in the parking lot or the stadium or any place on campus. We need to consider the people who are not drinking as well as the people who want to drink. From my experience as a sports spectator and a Red Cross volunteer, I have seen the mess the drinkers make spilled food and trash all over the place, including vomit (yuck). For instance, at concerts in Bramlage Coliseum, where tickets are around $18 per person, we have people sick or passed out in the rest rooms or the first aid office, missing the concert, and that is without alcohol being served there. If alcohol were to be sold on campus it would double or triple the number of "sick drunks" and the problem to everyone else.

Just go to a party some time and stay sober and watch your friends. Alcohol is a mindaltering drug. You can see how it changes behavior. People lose control and become irresponsible and sometimes nasty. Alcohol affects people in different ways; some get sappy, and some get violent. Is this the example you want to show to the young children, alumni and guests who attend our games? Please consider the negative image to K-State these "drunks" will project.

Rappers 'break new ground'

Public Enemy's 'Fear of a Black Planet' focuses on discrimination, environment

Rappers Public Enemy have constructed a stunning sonic framework on the group's third album, "Fear of a Black Planet." From that base, the group has focused its lyrical acuity to surpass any previous outings.

The long-awaited "Fear of a Black Planet" simultaneously answers the rappers' critics and breaks new ground. The lyrical content is unafraid and eye-opening.

In 1988, Public Enemy was on top of the rap community. The band's second album, "It Would Take a Na-tion of Millions To Hold Us Back," topped both sales and critics' charts. The group was hailed for its ability to transcend the braggadocio and selfimportance found in most rappers.

Last year's controversy overwhelmed the PE camp. The group made headlines over a series of anti-Semitic remarks made by Public Enemy's "Minister of Information" Professor Griff. The group disbanded briefly amidst the furor and Griff's status was on-again, offagain. The official word is Griff, a member whose actual creative contribution to the group is minimal, is out, and Public Enemy is back.

The much-delayed "Fear of a Black Planet" is in every way a better work than the seminal "It Would Take a Nation of Millions." Leader Chuck D's world view has widened in the interim. Although the rapper's goal of a unified, strong and educated black community is still his primary concern, Public Enemy tackles such diverse topics as discrimination against women and the environment.

Chuck D envisions Public Enemy as a black CNN, a network that addresses issues untouched by others. To his credit, he appears to have succeeded. All 20 tracks on "Fear of a Black Planet" are filled with immediacy and urgency. In a nutshell, it is social commentary packaged in everyday language.

In the rap context, Public Enemy must sell the messages to reach the intended listeners. Fortunately, the group has never had a problem doing

The musical mix is the most enthralling Public Enemy has ever utilized. Old soul and jazz records are plundered, rearranged and mulitated to create the grooves of the album. The scenery is constantly shifting. Repeated listenings will uncover countless unheard fragments of music. For every piece a listener recognizes, ten unknown pieces crop up. Booker T & the MGs melt into James Brown, which in turn becomes a heavy metal track. Public Enemy ingests what seems like the whole of ■ See ENEMY, Page 16

Class teaches ancient Japanese art

By Tim Clopton Collegian Reporter

The art of training bonsai trees has roots that stretch far into history. However, time has not stunted the growth of its popularity.

"One reason for the popularity of bonsai is you can do it in small places and you can imitate older trees," said Kent Kimmins, associate professor of horticulture. "The Japanese didn't have the land to have parks, so they grew bonsai to imitate landscape."

Although bonsai is generally associated with the Japanese, it is similar to an earlier art form practiced by the Chinese, called penjing, said Carl Clayberg, professor of horticulture.

"It's an art form like many of the ones the Japanese perform that originated in China. It goes back to at least 300 A.D.," Clayberg said. "In fact, many of the most valuable Japanese bonsai are grown in antique Chinese

The difference between bonsai and penjing is that the Japanese often use wire to shape their plants. The Chinese shape primarily by cutting and trimming, Clayberg said.

Bonsai plants vary in size from two inches to three feet high, and the

The Japanese referred to their size as one-hand, two-hands or fourhands, meaning two people," Clayberg said. "The word 'mame' refers to the little ones that would be just one-hand and are really small. They are commonly grown in what we would call thumb pots."

Kimmins, who has been working with bonsai for about 20 years, said the basic technique for keeping the plant compact is to cut the new growths back one-quarter to one half

Japanese described them in terms of inch from where they sprout.

Student to study Arabic

University in Jordan accepts junior for summer school

By Todd Ubben Collegian Reporter

Jodi Lookhart, junior in political science and international studies, will have the opportunity to experience the culture of the Middle East and study Arabic this summer in Jordan.

Lookhart will leave June 15 and spend two months in Jordan, attending classes at the University of Yarmouk in Irbid.

Lookhart received word last week from the University of Virginia, which coordinates the program, that she would be going. To help pay for the cost of the program, she applied for and received the Sheikh Ahmed Zaki Yamani Scholarship from the political science department in April.

Lookhart said the Arab culture has interested her for a long time. She has been involved in the Arab Student Association for two years and has taken Arabic language courses at the University as well as several courses in Middle Eastern history and politics.

In addition to visiting historic sites in Jordan, Lookhart said she's applying for a visa to go to Egypt and

"I look forward to meeting people, studying outside the American culture, as well as improving my Arabic," she said.

Lookhart said she plans to look at slides and pictures of Jordan and work on her conversational Arabic before she leaves.

Jennifer Bell, senior in political science, went to Jordan last summer as a Yamani Scholar and encouraged Lookhart to apply for the program.

Bell said she concentrated on and had some trouble speaking the local dialect during her stay.

"The greatest thing was just being exposed to another culture," she said.

speaking modern standard Arabic

Among the places Bell visited in Jordan were the Dead Sea, sites in Petra and the port city of Aqaba.

Bell said she spent 10 days in Jerusalem with a friend during Eid, a festive occasion marking the end of the Moslem holiday Ramadan.

Bell saw some of the violence related to the Intifada uprising first hand while touring the Holy City. She said it was upsetting and depressing.

Michael Suleiman, professor of political science and one of three people who selects the Yamani Scholars, said students sometimes either don't apply to study abroad or postpone their trip.

"A lot of them would have great desire or intention to go, but when the time comes they figure they have other plans for the summer," he said.

Suleiman said the Yamani Scholarship program was established in 1984 by Sheikh Yamani, former minister of petroleum in Saudi Arabia, who delivered a Landon Lecture that year.

It is open to students of any major who are interested in Arab studies at K-State, who are good students and who are willing to take a number of courses in the area and study Arabic, Suleiman said.

English student receives scholarship to Leningrad

By Julie Wakeman Collegian Reporter

Spending the summer in Leningrad won't be totally new to George Rueckert, a graduate student in English.

Rueckert was recently accepted to participate in the 1990 Russian Language summer program at the University of Leningrad, said Walter Kolonosky, associate professor of modern languages.

Rueckert said he has been to Leningrad before, but not on a scholarship to study the Russian language. He said he has studied Russian off and on for 10 years, including two consecutive years at K-State.

To be eligible for the scholarship, Rueckert had to complete at least four semesters of Russian, Kolonosky said. The program is sponsored by the Council on International Educational Exchange and attracts national competition for the limited numbers of scholarships available.

Rueckert said he will be with a group of about 30 other students. While in Leningrad they are supposed to speak only Russian. He said they are also supposed to make efforts to meet as many native people as they can.

"I plan on meeting the people, but I'm not sure about talking Russian the entire time. That could be difficult," he said.

Rueckert said the $1,200 scholarship will cover about one-third of his expenses, including transportation.

The group will also travel to other cities, but he said Leningrad in June is particularly beautiful because it is the time of the White Nights, when the sun stays up most of the night.

Rueckert will be in Leningrad from mid-June to mid-August for the university's summer session. He said he applied for a full semester scholarship last fall, but did not get it.

"I think the summer scholarships are easier to get than the semester ones because they are for the lower-level students," he said.

The application processes for both scholarships are fairly long, consisting of filling out forms, taking an exam and writing essays in Russian and English, Rueckert said. For the full semester application, there is a telephone interview in addition to the other requirements.

Rueckert said he would eventually like to be a translator, although he has a long way to go before he can speak Russian well enough to do it.

Festival bands play bluegrass

By Tim Clopton Collegian Reporter

Music, games and the fragrance of wines formed a collage of good times under an overcast sky. The scattered, light sprinkles of rain only helped the bluegrass grow.

Three bands performed for about 450 people during the second annual Bluegrass Festival and Family Fun Day Saturday at Fields of Fair

"The music is good bluegrass," said Vicky Wanamaker, a resident of Wamego. "I was here last year, and I'm back again. If you like this type of music, then Fields of Fair is great."

Each of the three bands played a two-hour set of bluegrass music to the relaxed crowd. Audience members were invited to bring their guitars, banjos, mandolins or fiddles and play with the bands.

"It's great fun playing in such a relaxed atmosphere," said Larry Welch, banjo player for New Tradition and instructor at Hutchinson Community College. "You don't have to be uptight because there's no pressure on you and you can enjoy it as much as the crowd does. Hopefully next year there will be more pickers in the crowd so we can start little jam sessions between sets. It could be like a tailgate party."

The music had a toe-tapping affect on many of those in the audience. "This type of music is really stir-

"This type of music is really stirring," Sandra Bettencourt, senior in marketing, said. "I keep getting this urge to get up and dance."

People played softball, volleyball and horseshoes at the recreation area while the bands spiced the air with their bluegrass rhythms.

Refreshments, including sandwiches, soft drinks, beer and wine, were available during the festivities, which lasted from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Michelle Porter, sophomore in arts and sciences, said she wished a similar event could be held in Manhattan.

"This is so much fun that I could stay here and drink wine the rest of my life," Porter said.

About 800 fewer people attended the festival this year than last year, said Billie Roberts, director of sales for the winery.

"I think we would have had a bigger crowd if the weather would've cooperated," Roberts said.

The festival was first organized last year to celebrate the opening of the winery, said Tootie Fair, co-owner of Fields of Fair.

Flea market offers 'junk'

By David Frese Collegian Reporter

Vendors started closing up shop Saturday evening around six o'clock at the Airport Flea Market, but people were still ambling in. Some were looking to buy, but most were just looking.

"You can see from what's here we sell anything and everything," said proprietor Ralph Wasem from behind the concession Above his head was a hand-written sign that read, "This is not a museum, this junk is

It was a museum of sorts, though. A museum of second-hand memories. Shelves and boxes were filled with used books with yellowing pages and old 78 rpm records. Matched and mismatched salt and pepper shakers covered two whole card tables. On the wall were black velvet paintings of Spanish conquistadors with vibrant green hats and in the middle of everything was a porcelain baby angel with blue wings.

These might be considered by some to be rotten old junk, but Wasem and his wife, Shirley Pride-Wasem, live by the old maxim - one person's junk is another's

"That's the way it is," Wasem said. "There've been things that even I thought were junk, and I had them sitting outside ready to take to the dump on Sunday night, and I've had people come out and ask what I want for them. There are things even we think have no value, and they do."

Wasem, who has been running the market since July 1988, has many stories to tell about the flea market. Once the market flooded and he and the other vendors lost thousands of dollars of merchandise. He has a brass telescoping fishing rod. To this day, neither he nor anyone else has ever seen another like it. And then there's the pair of goats he bought at an auction against his wife's advice. He thought she might be right and he'd end up having them around forever, but he sold them the next day.

As it is, Wasem is a self-proclaimed pack rat. He said he has two sheds full of things as well as having his attic filled to capacity. "We try to keep the TV room clear, but it's hopeless, our house is full of every-thing," Wasem said. "My son says to me, 'Dad, you've got one of everything ever made, but you don't know where it is." The flea market has an ever-changing face. Wasem said, and what's here today might be gone tomorrow.

'That's the beauty of a flea market. It changes all the time," he said. "People come out and look at something and think they cancome back next week to pick it up, but it'll Wasem and his wife travel to auctions, farm sales, garage sales and wherever else the hunt leads in search of merchandise for the market, but sometimes they don't have to go that far,

"People come to us and bring us things," he said. "Sometimes a fella'll pull up in a pickup and say, 'Come look and see what you'll give me for this.' Things with much greater value to us, but not to him. He might think that's a piece of junk. That's why he's getting rid of it. But we put it out and someone else comes in and says, 'That's just what I've been looking for.'

'We see the use and utility in things a lot of people don't think of," he said.

We sell antiques, uniques, collectibles and unusual items. We do not sell anything illegal or immoral, and we don't let anyone in who does," he said.

Wasem is not the only flea marketeer in the old warehouse. He rents space by the day, weekend or month to other vendors so they can sell also.

"These are nice folks," he said. "The flea market person is just a different breed of cat. Flea market people are unique — they're just nice folk. We enjoy meeting people."

Wasem and his wife both have full-time jobs during the week, but many hours are devoted to preparing for the weekends. Wasem said he'll spend time doing little things like removing knobs from otherwise worthless items just to create business.

"We take those knobs and sell them for a ■ See FLEA, Page 16

Student 'clowns around' for extra money

By Todd Ubben Collegian Reporter

Troy Shepherd clowns around for fun, but there's an element of danger in his fun. Shepherd's clowning partners are rodeo bulls weighing anywhere from 1,600 to 2,500 pounds.

Shepherd, senior in music education, said he considered whether to ride the bulls or fight them as a rodeo clown, and he opted for the latter. "When you can make these animals do what you want them to do, it's really fun to see, and it's fun for the clowns because we beat the bull," Shepherd said.

"People say that rodeo clowns are crazy, but after you're out there once or twice, you really don't feel crazy, because you've got to have your head

Working rodeos, fighting bulls provide excitement, danger about you at all times," he said.

A professional rodeo clown introduced Shepherd to the basics of bullfighting at the K-State Rodeo two years ago. Shepherd admitted the experience was a scary one. "I had some big old baggy sweat pants on, and you could still see my knees shaking," he said. "It's still hard to just stand there and let this animal just run straight at you."

Huge jeans called "baggies" are common for clowning purposes outside the arena, while cut-up jean skirts with running tights or sweats are normally worn in the arena, Shepherd said.

safer than baggies, as they are easier to take off. Football shoes, girdle pads, traditional makeup, bandannas and other bright clothes are also part of his wardrobe.

Shepherd attended the Youth Rodeo School near Olathe in March. He learned how to work hang-ups where the rider is caught in the bull's rigging - and how to fight freestyle, with no rider involved.

A clown's objectives are to protect the rider, get the bull away and then

"I'm in the general vicinity of either the bull's head or the rider as Shepherd said skirts are much soon as the ride is over," Shepherd

Dummies weighing 50 to 100 pounds are used by the clowns to distract the bulls during the riding events. A rodeo clown called a funnyman hides in a barrel and aids the bullfighter, Shepherd said.

He said quickness is not a necessity for rodeo clowns. The only way to beat the bull is to get him running in circles or corners.

"It seems really dumb to say it, but the closer you are, the better off you are," he said.

Shepherd has worked four profes-deos in Kansas, including the K-State Rodeo. He is employed by contractors in Kansas, Iowa, Missouri and Oklahoma.

Shepherd said he has heard of some professional clowns who make a living at clowning, but for him it just brings in extra money.

Although he has been run over many times by the bulls he's fought, Shepherd said he has not been severely injured. He has pulled a groin muscle, received a small cut on his thumb from a bull's horn and broken a blood vessel in his thumb. Performing in pain is the only bad thing about injuries, he said.

"If it's not a real serious injury, you still have to go out there even though you're hurting," Shepherd Knee injuries and broken ribs, hands and arms are more serious and common, he said.

"These bulls have a lot of power in their bodies," Shepherd said. "The barrels weigh 500 to 600 pounds, and they throw them like little rubber

Shawn Potts, freshman in animal sciences, said he and Shepherd are the only two members of Rodeo Club interested in clowning. Potts said Shepherd taught him much of what was taught at the rodeo school.

Auction aids injured animals

Project Release an opportunity for vet med students interested in wildlife care

By Heather Anderson Collegian Reporter

Proceeds from items auctioned Saturday in CiCo Park by Project Release will fund new cages, food supplies and equipment for wild animals.

Project Release was created about a year ago as an outgrowth of K-State veterinary medicine students interested in wildlife care, said Steve Hoffman, president of the group.

"K-State doesn't have the facilities for the full recovery of wildlife, especially birds, which need more space to fly," Hoffman said. "The difference between the recovery of a bird in a small cage and a large cage is tremendous."

Most of the volunteers who build the large cages and care for the animals are students, although members of the community contribute in different ways.

"Our larger cash donations and materials are from older people, or those who prefer not to pick up the mess from a large hawk," Hoffman said.

Hoffman said he didn't want to disclose the location of the cages because the animals need to avoid human contact to survive.

"Every time a new person comes out to the site, it puts stress on the animals," he said. "It's important that people don't visit the site, because we're trying to minimize human contact with the animals. That way, the animals don't associate humans with food."

Animals are brought to the site through the University's veterinary medicine program and area veterinarians, Hoffman said.

"They come from all over, not just the county," he said. "Someone brings an animal to the local vet, and if the vet doesn't know what to do with the animal, he or she calls K-State."

All medical needs for the animals are handled by veterinarians, and the group deals with rehabilitation and release into the wild.

Birds that can never be released into the wild for one reason or another were at the auction.

A red-tailed hawk, which was found wounded along I-70, will never be able to fly again, and must always be kept in captivity, said Roger Wallace, group member and volunteer coordinator of Sunset Zoo.

"This is a very unusual case, because the wing had been broken and healed in a bad position," Wallace said. "That's unusual, because that means it found enough food to survive without being able to fly for about four to six weeks."

Wallace said hawks feed mostly on mice and rabbits and hunt from a perch, swooping down to capture their prey.

Rosie, an American kestrel, was mistaken as an orphan bird and raised in human captivity, he said.

"She is imprinted on people, which means she doesn't quite understand that she's a bird and she's supposed to hunt for her own food,"

As a result, the bird is unable to take care of itself in the wild and is used for educational purposes by the zoo.

"She actually enjoys being in a room full of people," Wallace said. "She's lost her fear of people, and I think she likes to see the movement and colors."

Aquila, a golden eagle from Sunset Zoo, is also unable to fly, due to damage to her right wing. Aquila was adopted through the zoo's animal adoption program as one of the animals auctioned for the benefit of Project Release.

Sharon Taylor, junior in veterinary medicine and volunteer for the group, recently raised five baby raccoons and released them into the Taylor and her husband Mark fed them every two to four hours with a kitten baby bottle for two months.

"It's better to get more of them as babies, because they miss the warmth of the mother and can huddle together," she said.

When the raccoons grew to weaning age, the Taylors had to teach them how to catch and wash their food, like a mother raccoon would.

"We went out and bought a plastic swimming pool, and put minnows and crayfish in it, which are a big part of their diet, and taught them how to catch them," Taylor said. "We would bend over and act like we were catching them and washing them." Taylor said the babies didn't know how to use their fingers and had to learn to hold and wash grapes before moving on to fish or grasshoppers.

After two months of weaning, the raccoons were moved to the Project Release site to get used to the wild.

Taylor said the raccoons were fed through blinds to avoid human contact, and the couple made loud noises when near the cages to make the animals scared of humans.

"The wilder they are, the better chance they have to live," Taylor said. "If they aren't afraid of humans, they'll walk right up to a dog or a hunter and get into trouble."

She said it was hard to avoid contact with the raccoons after nursing them as babies.

"When they were little, they had to be cuddled and held close, and then, all of a sudden, we had to be real firm with them and made them afraid of us," she said.

When they were six months old, the raccoons were released into the wild.

Taylor said raccoons and oppossums take longer to release into the wild than other animals.

"Rabbits only take three weeks, and so do baby squirrels," Taylor said.

'Cats clinch conference tourney berth

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

LINCOLN, Neb. - Let the celebration begin; the 'Cats are in. The K-State baseball team split a four-game weekend series with Nebraska Friday and Saturday, and in so doing assured themselves of qualifying for the Big Eight Postseason Tournament for the first time since 1985.

The Wildcats, now 12-8 in conference play and 29-22 overall, dropped the opening and final games of the series against the homestanding Cornhuskers, but the two wins in the middle gave Coach Mike Clark and company reason to celebrate as Saturday afternoon became evening.

Each of the top four teams in the conference race at season's end makes the trip to Oklahoma City for the league tourney. And now, with the doubleheader split between Kansas and Iowa State Sunday removing all doubt, the Wildcats can't possibly be bumped.

Not even a sweep of the Wildcats by Oklahoma State in Stillwater later this week would deny the 'Cats an extended stay down South.

But this team isn't thinking of coming in through the back door. Clark said his players want to enter through the front - with a championship. Oklahoma State, 15-5 in Big Eight play, is in command, but with a sweep ...

"The kids know that if we take it to them down there, we can be the champs," Clark said. "And that's what they're talking about. We've got one goal that we worked for all year accomplished - and that's a credit to the young men in our program - but now they're thinking about more.'

The first goal for the Wildcats to win 12 conference games and make it to the tourney - was completed when third baseman Brad Rippelmeyer caught a foul pop to end game No. 3 of the series.

In the contest that turned out to be the clincher, a pair of former Shawnee Mission South standouts put together a little magic in Wildcat uniforms.

K-State first baseman Chris Hmielewski tries to tag out Nebraska second baseman Kevin Jordan in the 'Cats' victory over the Cornhuskers Saturday in the third game of the four-game series. The teams split the series in Lincoln. With the two victories, the 'Cats edged closer to earning a spot in the Big Eight Tournament May 16-20.

Brian Culp was the hitting star for K-State, cracking a three-run homer on a 2-0 pitch in the fourth inning of the 9-8 Wildcat win.

"It was a fastball - probably not as fast as he wanted - but it was a fastball," Culp said of the ball he hit over the leftfield fence off Nebraska reliever Josh Bullock, who started the series opener Friday.

After a pair of homers by Nebraska had cut what had been at one time a four-run K-State lead to one, 9-8, Greg Laddish came on to retire seven straight hitters over the final 21/2 innings to notch his first collegiate save.

The sophomore said his high school work with Culp and Co. at South prepared him for what he faced against the 'Huskers - constant pressure with the game on the

"I wanted the ball," he said. "My high school background made it so I wasn't really nervous. It was kind of weird not being nervous, but with Dan (catcher Skala) calling the pitches, all I had to do was execute."

And execute he did, working through the top and then the heart of the Nebraska order in 1-2-3 fashion in the eighth and ninth innings.

That gave the win to Dave Christensen, 5-2, who was starting in place of Kent Hipp, who was scratched from the rotation with a sore right elbow.

Friday's Doubleheader In the opening game of the series, Nebraska rocked K-State ace David Hierholzer and took a 7-5 win. The 'Huskers reached Hierholzer, 7-4, for 12 hits, including solo homers by Bill Vosik and Bobby Benjamin. Benjamin had three RBIs in the game. Meanwhile, a trio of Cornhusker hurlers were holding the 'Cats far enough at bay. Middle reliever Armando Garza, 2-6, got the win, with the save going to Dave Matranga.

The nightcap — the first of two Wildcat wins — could have been called the Brad Rippelmeyer show. Rippelmeyer, yet another K-State sophomore, hit two long homers and had three RBIs to lead the Wildcats to a 7-6 win.

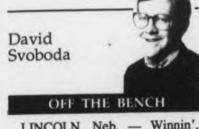

His second blast, a two-run shot in the third, cleared the outfield fence in the power alley in leftcenter and caromed off the scoreboard while still in full flight.

The pitching victory went to Sean Pedersen, an Omaha, Neb., native who was pitching his collegiate game in his home state against a team that didn't recruit him. Pedersen, 5-4, got relief help from Steve Scoville, who notched save ■ See BASEBALL, Page 11

'Cats victory against 'Huskers biggest in 5 seasons

LINCOLN, Neb. - Winnin', like, it's so much better than losin'. Nuke, I couldn't have said it better myself.

But this isn't Durham, N.C., and I'm not watching a movie about a run-down minor league baseball franchise.

This is a story about a Big Eight

Conference baseball team that believed in itself when very few others did, and as a result will be doing what very few other K-State baseball teams have ever done - dancing at the party alongside the big

But I guess you'd have to consider these boys in purple to be pretty big now, too. With a split in their weekend series here, Coach Mike Clark's team assured itself of a trip to the Big Eight Postseason Tournament in Oklahoma City.

The trip will be the first for a K-State team since 1985.

That, in and of itself, would be celebrate.

But put that champagne back in the fridge, hon'. I want to tell ya a story about a coach, some players and a dream.

Back in 1987, this guy named Clark came to K-State from Northeastern Oklahoma A&M and started the process of building a contending team virtually from scratch. The Wildcats had been in the Big Eight tourney in '85, but with a less-thanimpressive 8-14 loop mark.

He hired him some real neat assistants, like this guy named Stewart (Jeff, now the head coach at Illinois State), and his replacement, a guy sufficent enough reason to named Morgan (Phil, K-State's current full-time assistant).

And they started gettin' 'em some guys who could flat play to go along with some guys who had more heart than Andre the Giant.

You know the kind I'm talking about, don't you? Those guys like Dan Skala, a fifth-year senior who first hooked up the tools of ignorance (he's a catcher, hon') when Gary Vaught was still the coach in these parts. Skala might not be all-conference material, but he gives 100 percent every pitch of every game. Clark likes that, and it sets a great

And how 'bout that Ringgenberg character. Russ is his first name. He's from right here in the good ol' Little Apple. He's the preseason all-America candidate who has had two operations on his back. Probably shouldn't be playing, but try to tell him that.

See what I mean about heart? You like young guys? How about some sophomores?

Seems as if Clark liked the state of Illinois a whole bunch a couple of years back. Went up there and got him a shortstop, a guy to man the hot corner, and a lefty who could pitch and bang balls off aluminum barns every other day (well, maybe not every other day). Wilson, Rippelmeyer and Hmielewski are their names. I think their parents call 'em Craig, Brad and Chris. And how 'bout the rest of this cast of characters - and I do mean characters - Harry, Fly, Stinky, Professor ... the list goes on and on.

Seems as if Clark told these guys they were going to have to build their own stadium last year. They did it. Guess what? About 6,155 people filled those stands to cheer this group on one year later.

Bet Clark was sweatin' over whether his boys knew anything ab-■ See SVOBODA, Page 11

Preakness up next for Derby winner

By The Associated Press

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - Unbridled was getting a bath when he turned his head and looked at trainer Carl

"He's looking at me and thinking, 'What are they talking to you about, I'm the one that did it," Nafzger said

What the colt did was win the Kentucky Derby in impressive fashion. Now, he'll try to win the Preakness. "If the horse is OK, and I think it's OK, we'll go to the Preakness," Nafzger said, after the Derby winner jogged once around the Churchill Downs track.

Summer Squall, who was second, 31/2 lengths back in the 11/4 -mile Derby Saturday at Churchill Downs, and Mister Frisky, the beaten favorite, who was eighth, also appear headed to Baltimore and the Preakness May 19 at Pimlico.

"We'll give ourselves a day or two to sort things out, but we're leaning in that direction," Cot Campbell, the owner of Dogwood Stable, which races Summer Squall, said of the 1 3-16-mile Preakness.

"He ran well. We're proud of Summer Squall, the second betting choice, had the lead at the quarter pole, then Unbridled blew by him, "(Jockey Pat Day) said at the quarter pole the roar of the crowd startled him a little and he lost his concentration for a couple of seconds," said Neil Howard, trainer of Summer 'But he wasn't going to beat Unbridled if they went around five more "He ran a bad race yesterday, and I don't know why," trainer Laz Barrera said of Mister Frisky's first loss in 17 starts. "(Jockey Gary Stevens) said the horse was running, but he wasn't grabbing the track. When a horse doesn't like the track, there's nothing you can do about it. I'm not making excuses, but it's the only thing I can think about it.' Trainer Chris Speckert said he would talk to owner Thomas Mellon Evans about sending third-place

Pleasant Tap to the Preakness. Speckert seemed inclined to skip the Preakness and run Pleasant Tap in the 11/4 -mile Belmont Stakes June

"I think you have to bear in mind the horse only ran 11 days ago (in the Lexington April 24)," Speckert said.

Video Ranger, who finished fourth, will go to New York and await the Belmont. Thirty Six Red, who was ninth, also is being pointed to the Belmont.

Trainer D. Wayne Lukas said seventh-place Land Rush will run in the Preakness.

Miller unloads best discus effort

From Staff and Wire Reports AMES, Iowa - Prior to Friday's

Vieshea Invitational at Iowa State, K-State track coach John Capriotti said the meet would provide a good tune-up for the Big Eight Champ-ionships May 19-21 at Norman,

Wildcat thrower Angie Miller had other thoughts in mind, however. The junior from Frankfort uncorked her best discus throw of the season, winning the event with an NCAA Outdoor-qualifying toss of Miller then entered the Jayhawk Invitational in Lawrence Saturday and unleashed her best discus throw ever at 179-8, the best toss among collegiate discus throwers this season.

Her mark Friday had already qualified Miller for her second evnet at the May 31-June 2 NCAA Championships. She had previously qualified in the shot put, an event which she also won on Friday with a toss of 48-9.

The Vieshea was the fourth time Miller has won both events at a meet this season, and her discus throw outdistanced the field by more than 20 feet.

Together, the K-State men and women combined for 12 first-place performances on the day.

Three weeks ago, at the Kansas Relays, sophomore high jumper R.D. Cogswell cleared 7 feet for the first time in his K-State career after setting the relays' prep record at 7-foot-1 as a senior at Topeka-Seaman High School in 1987.

Well, Cogswell bettered even that effort Friday with a leap of 7-11/4 to win his first-ever college meet title.

Freshman Marcus Wright turned in the third-best all-time K-State performance in the 800 meters with a winning time of 1:48.8, while fellow freshman Jared Storm was right behind Wright in 1:50.6.

Brad Massey led a K-State sweep of the top four places in the javelin at 205-3, while Matt Thorne was second at 199-2, Richard Croll third at 197-8, and Todd Ohlde fourth at 172-11. And Janet Treiber did the same in the 5,000 meters with Janet Haskin, Angie Barry and Renee Russell right behind her.

Other K-State winners were Tyrone Watkins in the 400 meters, Orlo Berry in the triple jump, Markeya Jones in the 200 meters, Paulette Staats in the 3,000 meters, Debbie Schmidt in the javelin, and the men's 1,600-meter relay team.

letters tracksters

From Staff and Wire Reports K-State track and field Coach John Capriotti has announced the signing of eight athletes to national letters of intent. All eight signees have had an impact at both the state and national level, and Capriotti said he expects that same success to carry over to the collegiate scene. "Every one of these kids can come in and help us right away in the conference," Capriotti said. "We've been trying to be more selective in our recruiting, and these eight signees are a result of that."

Among the signees is a pair of jumpers who have posted some of the best prep marks in the country this season. Gwen Wentland of Grand Blanc, Mich., has cleared 5-111/2 in the high jump outdoors and had the best indoor mark of the year at 5-10%. Lisa Fager of Mission Viejo, Calif., has the secondbest high school effort in the nation in the triple jump at 40-101/2.

"Those two women already have marks in high school that could possibly qualify them for this year's NCAA meet," Capriotti said. "Right now, they would both be among the top three in the Big Eight

Capriotti also inked a group of four distance runners in Rob Huff, Phil Byrne, Todd Trask and Amy Marx. Huff is a miler from Bloomfield Hills, Mich., who placed fifth at the National Scholastic Indoor Championships earlier this year in in their events."

4:16.9. Byrne will transfer to K-State from Johnson County Community College, where he finished second in the two-mile run with a time of

Syracuse, N.Y., with a time of 9:03 at the NJCAA meet last year. Trask will transfer from Santa Rosa (Calif.) Junior College, where he won the California state junior college cross country title last year. while Marx, of Lincoln (Neb.) Southeast High School, won the Nebraska Class A girls' cross country title last year. She was also state champion in the two-mile and onemile while living in Arkansas.

Tony Music of Grand Junction, Colo., won the gold medal in the Colorado Meet of Champions and has personal-best throws of 61-9% in the shot put and 172-0 in the discus, while Chris Tozier of Hesston won the state 3A title in the shot last year and has a personal best of

K.C. finally wins with comeback

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - How bad has it been for Kansas City? Moments after beating the Chicago White Sox 7-6 in 10 innings Sunday, the Royals' manager John Wathan got a congratulatory call from his 8-year-old daughter. "Thank you, sweetheart," Wathan. "I love you, too."

"How about that," Wathan said as he cradled the phone. "Somebody in this town still loves me."

Close friends and loved ones have been hard for all the Royals to find during a ghastly start to a season brimming with great expectations. Losers of 10 of their last 11 before Sunday, they blew a 5-0 lead to the surging White Sox before Jim Eisenreich doubled with one out and Mike MacFarlane singled with two outs off Bobby Thigpen (1-2) in the 10th to win it.

After the White Sox scored two in the eighth and two in the ninth, Mac-Farlane said, "Guys were really screaming. We're sick and tired of

The White Sox, who had won eight of 10, were going for their first three-game sweep in Kansas City since 1975.

"A game like that, there is no turning point," said Chicago manager Jeff Torborg. "The last run scored is the turning point in a game like that. Kansas City battled back and showed what they're made of, and we battled back, and we'll continue to do that."

Mark Davis, who led the major leagues in save percentage last year by converting 44 of 48 chances, blew his third in seven opportunities for Kansas City. He took over in the ninth with a 5-4 lead, but Scott Fletcher walked with one out, Ozzie Guillen singled and rookie Craig Grebeck, batting .083, singled home the tying run.

A walk to Lance Johnson loaded the bases and finished Davis. Steve Farr (2-1) struck out Ivan Calderon, but walked Dan Pasqua.

The Royals rebounded with a run in their ninth when rookie Terry Shumpert hit a one-out triple and scored on Kevin Seitzer's sacrifice fly.

Bret Saberhagen pitched four-hit ball for seven innings in his sharpest outing of the season for Kansas City. He gave up two runs, struck out five and walked three.

Pasqua's two-run homer in the eighth off Jeff Montgomery pulled the White Sox to within 5-4.

Bo Jackson, making his first start of the year in center field, made a diving catch of Calderon's drive in the first inning but misjudged Guillen's liner into an RBI triple in the fifth. Jackson hit a ground-rule double in the second and later scored on Gerald Perry's sacrifice fly.

Melido Perez walked Seitzer and Kurt Stillwell with one out in the third, and George Brett sliced a barely-fair, opposite-field double that scored Seitzer. With two outs, Eisenreich walked to load the bases and Perry slapped an RBI single into right. Ken Patterson then relieved Perez and walked MacFarlane, forcing in the Royals' fourth run.

Knicks, Suns advance

BOSTON - The New York Knicks became only the third NBA team to win a best-of-5 series after losing the first two games and ended their 26-game losing streak at Boston Garden, beating the Boston Celtics 121-114 Sunday, as Patrick Ewing

The Knicks now advance to the best-of-7 Eastern Conference semifinals against Detroit, who ousted Indiana.

Meanwhile, in Salt Lake City, Kevin Johnson's 16-foot jumper with less than one second remaining gave the Suns a 104-102 victory over the Utah Jazz, in the deciding game of the best-of-5 opening-round, NBA playoff series.

Johnson's winning basket, which gave him 26 points for the game, puts the Suns in the Western Conference semifinal series against the Los Angeles Lakers, who defeated Houston in their first-round series.

In other conference semifinal action, Philadelphia will play Chicago, and Portland has a one-game lead over San Antonio.

Golfers finish 11th in Illinois

GENOA, III. - The K-State men's golf team finished in a tie for 11th place Saturday at the fourth annual, 19-team Midwestern Invitational at Northern Illinois.

The Wildcats improved during the final round of play, taking 19 strokes off their first round total of 319, to wind up with 619 for the tourney. Bad weather was a big reason for Friday's high scores.

Individually, K-State was led by Jeff Sedorcek, who was playing in his final tournament for the Wildcats. Sedorcek shot a 77-74 for a two-day total of 151 and a tie for 12th place

Bobby Donnellan was next for K-State at 154, followed by Richard Laing at 156, Brett Vuillemin at 160 and T.A. Fowler Fowler was the only other senior to make the trip to the 'Cats' final tourney of the season. "I'm reasonably pleased. We played a little better today," Bunker said Saturday. "We finished in the middle of the pack, and, under those conditions, that's pleasing."

KU signs Cortez Barnes

LAWRENCE - Kansas basketball coach Roy Williams has announced that Cortez Barnes, a 6-foot-8 guard-forward from Wichita, signed a letter of intent to play for the Jayhawks. Barnes averaged 19.6 points and 9.5 rebounds per game last season for Wichita Heights High School. He shot 53 percent from the field, including 58 percent of his three-point attempts, and 73 percent from the free-throw line.

Kansas has signed seven players during this recruiting year and has one scholarship remaining.

Saturday's second game After K-State got the win it wanted in the first game of the Saturday twinbill, the Wildcats went quickly and quietly in the nightcap, dropping a 4-0 contest.

Doug Tegtmeier, 6-2, threw a nifty two-hitter for the 'Huskers, allowing only a single by Culp in the first and a double by Kevin Kaufman in the third.

Chris Hmielewski, 3-4, took the loss for the Wildcats, despite turning in his best performance on the mound in his last three outings. His one early mistake resulted in a two-run homer by Nebraska's Shawn Buchanan.

Border Witness Program offers insight

Students examine policies on Central American refugees

By Donna Warren Collegian Reporter

The Community Service Program is organizing a trip to Brownsville, Texas, for students to learn more about the U.S. Government's position on Central American refugee rights.

Michelle Dutton, sophomore in marketing, is the student coordinator of the trip, which is titled "The Border Witness Program."

The trip is also sponsored by the Rio Grande Defense Committee, Dutton said. The Rio Grande Defense Committee works to create an informed testimony against the current administration's denial of Central American refugee rights as they enter the United States at the Texas-Mexico border.

Dutton said this organization arranges tours for groups who participate in the witness program. She said they have worked with other universities, community and religious groups. The trip will include visits to U.S.

and privately run detention facilities, pro bono legal service offices, immigration courts, refugee advocate groups and machine shops in Mexico, Dutton said.

She said the trip, scheduled for May 17-24, will cost about $200 per person. This includes an $80 tour fee that goes for administrative costs of the Rio Grande Defense Committee. She said the rest of the money is what she estimates the students will spend on food, gas and personal expenses.

The students are also responsible for their own transportation to Texas, and carpooling is being encouraged, she said. The students will be staying Brownsville.

Carol Peak, director of the Community Service Program, said the trip is being organized as an educational tour. She said it should provide students with a better understanding of the issues concerning the human rights of refugees.

Peak also said the trip will provide first-hand experience with the facilities and programs designed for immigrants.

She said many of the students going on the trip are pre-law majors whose own interest and concern for these issues have prompted them to make the trip.

Twelve students, including Dutton, participated in a similiar trip to Harlingen, Texas, during spring

"The trip was politically an eye-opener," Dutton said. "I saw things the U.S. Government is doing that I personally don't agree with, and I believe people should be aware of these Shelby Shanks, senior in political science and humanities, also went on the spring break trip.

"I think the most significant thing about the trip was meeting the refugees and finding out the human rights abuse victims are real people and not just numbers," Shanks said. "I feel ike I've lived a really sheltered life after seeing what I saw."

Dutton said a maximum of 15 people can go to Brownsville, and 12 people have already signed up.

She said anyone interested in the trip can contact her at the Community Service Program in Eisenhower

Citizens discuss environment, industry growth

By Heather Anderson Collegian Reporter

Environmental concerns were raised by Riley County citizens at an open meeting of the Vision Committee of the Blank Page Economic Task Force.

The meeting of the committee Thursday night at Manhattan Fire Department Headquarters was designed for citizens to voice their concerns and ideas for economic development in Riley County.

The meeting is the last in a series of five that have been in different locations throughout the

Ted Haggart, chairman of the Vision Committee, said he expected to hear the environmental concerns and that they were expressed in the other meetings as "I think those concerns reflect that people see the tremendous asset Manhattan has in its environment." Haggart said. "It's one of the reasons so many live here. Economic development raises the fear that the environment will be compromised for growth."

Helen Roser, who moved to Manhattan from California, said environmental concerns are too often overlooked.

"It is very common for the essential qualities of life to be taken for granted," Roser said. "Bringing in industry will destroy Manhattan's selling points space and clean air." Bruce Snead, Cooperative Extension instructor, said Manhattan needs to implement a cautious growth policy.

"Bigger is not necessarily better," Snead said.

In order to survive, Manhattan needs to be more energy efficient, because energy runs the economy. and traditional energy supplies such as oil and fuel are running out, he said.

Snead suggested recycling newspapers into housing insulation, which would help with recycling, improve housing and create industry.

However, he said the current insulation business in the area needs to be considered, because it would be useless to create an industry while destroying another.

Other concerns were also

John Biggs, president of the Manhattan Arts Council, said the arts and local artists should fit into the economic development picture. He said although art contributes many things to life, people forget it is also for sale.

"Artists' creations should be looked at as an industry," Biggs

He said the city and county rely too much on K-State to provide art facilities and entertainment.

"K-State art facilities are for K-State students and not always accessible to citizens," Biggs told the committee.

He said although the city spends millions of dollars on recreational facilities, which serve the city well, very little is spent on

People need to regard the arts as more than just a spectator sport, Biggs said, and experience them for themselves.

Haggart said he was pleased to hear Biggs' reminder of the arts as an industry, because he himself often forgets it as well.

"This would be an ideal place to attract associations of the arts." Haggart said.

'However, one of our limitations is transportation. An association is dependent upon bringing in people, and air transportation is critical," he said.

Haggart suggested the idea of a regional airport, rather than area towns such as Topeka, Manhattan ■ See GROWTH, Page 16

Design seniors display work

Projects receive attention with portfolio presentations; students gain experience

By Amy Hadlock Collegian Reporter

Graduating seniors in graphic design displayed their work Friday night at the K-State Union.

"This is a very good experience for the graduating seniors, because this is how they will actually present their work to future employers," said Karol Winegardner, assistant professor of art.

"This year is our largest graduating class — 19," Winegardner said.
"The class members organized the presentation all themselves. They had different committees such as publicity and refreshments that helped to put it all together."

Winegardner said the presentation is also a good way to make sure the students finish their final projects on

"Having a portfolio presentation provides a little push for the students so they will be sure and have their projects completed," she said. "This is the time they must be finished anyway, so it just provides a little extra incentive.'

The presentation was open to the public, but the audience was made up mostly of family and friends.

"Right now, we don't have any employers coming and looking, but maybe in the future," Winegardner said. "However, we did have some professionals come in and look at the students' work and critique it before the portfolio presentation.'

"The presentation is a good way for the public to see what is coming out of the graphic arts program," said Mike Kastens, senior in graphic design. "This is a good chance for high school students to see what the program has to offer."

With 19 graduates, there were 19 different portfolios, each one having its own techniques and talents.

There are a variety of different things at the presentation," said Lorinda Sultzer, graphic designer for the Union. "All of the students have their own talents. Some of the portfolio pieces are done in watercolor and marker, some are done on a computer, a few of the pieces were done for matrix and some are freelance pieces.'

The College of Agriculture and the department of agricultural economics will offer a new agribusiness curriculum for the fall 1990 semester.

The new bachelor of science degree in agribusiness will replace the agribusiness option offered to agricultural economics majors, said Marc Johnson, head of the agricultural economics department.

"This departmental degree will be a four-year program," Johnson said. "It will combine agriculture and business courses."

The new degree requires students to take courses in management, accounting, marketing and finance, he

Johnson said there were two reasons for creating the new curriculum. First, there was a demand from the industry.

A 1986 Department of Agriculture study forecast a shortage of collegeeducated people in agriculture and agribusiness, Johnson said.

"We found that true because our recruiters were saying they were having a hard time finding people for their jobs," he said.

A report by the National Agricultural Business Education Commission noted an impending shortage of people qualified to go into agribusiness, Johnson said. It concluded that a business degree did not put students in a position to understand food products and their markets, and the same was true of agricultural economics students, who were not qualified in some aspects of business.

"This is why the need to combine the two curriculums into one came about," Johnson said. "The students will get a basic knowledge of both areas for an understanding in the market and for agricultural food products."

The second reason for creating the new curriculum was to help students entering the job market, Johnson

"When the industry knows we have the agribusiness program, our students will be more marketable and better prepared to qualify for the type of jobs they want," he said.

This gives students the opportunity for many options in business while still in the agribusiness major," said Mike Kadel, senior in agricultural economics. "This clearly defines agribusiness as a curriculum. I

Marine feels relief at verdict

By The Associated Press

BOSTON - When a judge ruled in favor of Martin Gaffney in his AIDS lawsuit against the U.S. government, the Marine officer didn't do much celebrating.

Instead, he left the South Weymouth Naval Air Station where he is a computer specialist and drove to Nantasket Beach. There he found a deserted strip of sand to walk along and think.

"I just kind of turned to the ocean and breathed a sigh of relief," said Gaffney, 40, whose four-year legal battle ended April 26 when a judge ruled that negligence by Navy doctors in 1981 led to Gaffney's wife contracting the AIDS virus through a blood transfusion. She died in 1987.

Gaffney also lost a 13-month-old son to the disease and has tested positive for the human immunodeficiency virus that causes AIDS, although he shows no symptoms.

Along with relief he feels rage, he said.

"At first I was pretty angry," he said. "I felt disgust that it had taken four years to get to this point. Then I just wished Matsuko would have been here to share it."

The family's ordeal began in 1981 when Gaffney's Japanese-born wife, Matsuko, entered the Long Beach Naval Hospital to have a baby.

Gaffney's suit claimed Navy doctors botched his wife's pregnancy by failing to perform a Caesarean section when Matsuko Gaffney was two weeks late in delivering the baby. The baby, a boy, was eventually stillborn and Matsuko Gaffney required a blood transfusion. The blood she was given was contaminated with the AIDS virus.

New center assists impaired

By Erica Yenni Collegian Reporter

About 200,000 more speech or hearing-impaired Kansans are now able to call anyone in the continental United States at any hour of the day or night. Until Monday, if a speech or hearing-impaired person in Kansas wanted to use the telephone after 5 p.m. weekdays or on weekends, they were out of luck, said Ron Malcolm, chairman of the Kansas Relay Service Inc. advisory council. The calls had to be made through operator-assisted relay centers that only operated from 8

Friday. Monday's opening of the Kansas Relay Center made the process easier, however.

After practice calls were made to various places in Kansas, the center officially opened in Lawrence. About 400 people attended the opening and tours were held until noon, when it officially opened.

Harold Nord, a hearing impaired impaired person can call a hearing

With the use of a TDD or a teletypewriter (TTY), anyone can communicate with a speech or hearingimpaired person via the center.

Marcie Wood, Southwestern Bell Telephone area manager for North Kansas, said callers wanting to use the service must first call the center's toll-free number.

Specially-trained operators receive typed messages from speech or hearing-impaired callers, Wood said. At the same time the operators receive the message, they read it to the hearing person. The spoken response is then typed back to the Malcolm, who is hearingimpaired, said the new service will allow many more calls in a shorter time frame with no waiting time for an operator.

"If a deaf consumer wants to order a pizza, apply for a job, alert a family member of a death in the family, reach a hospital or fire station, all this can now be done after 5 p.m.," said Malcolm. "What a wonderful time in the history of deaf culture and telecommunications."

Van Leeuwen said the operation of the relay center was designed by the Kansas Commission for the Deaf and Hearing Impaired and the state telecommunications industry through the Kansas Telecommunications Association. The center is funded by all Kansas telecommunications companies.

Budget cuts send officials into quandary

By Gregory A. Branson Donna Warren Collegian Reporters

A cut of more than $4 million in the 1991 budget has put K-State adminstrators between the proverbial rock and a hard place.

In order to keep the state's general fund at a level of at least $100 million, legislators approved a 1.75 percent across-the-board cut for all regents institutions.

Lawmakers passed a bill earlier during the session that requires a balance of at least $100 million in the general fund at the end of each fiscal year to ensure the state operates in the black.

"The 1.75 percent cut took about $1.8 million from K-State's budget and about another $140,000 from the veterinary school budget," John Struve, K-State budget director, said.

These cuts come right on the heels of a $2.1 million cut in the enrollment adjustment. K-State had been expecting $4.7 million of it to be refunded to offset the jump in the number of students this past school year.

"At first we thought the biggest loss would be losing half of the enrollment adjustment," Provost James Coffman said. "Later last week, we saw this other big cut coming and it really knocked us off our feet."

These cuts have challenged administrators with the question of where the lost money is going to come from. What will stay and what will go is the current issue.

Administrators met this past weekend and are meeting this week to discuss how K-State will cope with the cuts, but no solutions have been decided upon yet. "The effect will be felt all campus," Struve said. "KSU will not be able to operate at the same level."

He said it was too early to be specific, but some services and class offerings will probably have to be cut or discontinued.

Coffman said the problem is a question of finding uncommitted money. Most of the money from the state goes to paying salaries, and that type of money is committed.

Money that isn't committed would be salaries from temporary appointments, and will probably be the first to be cut, he said.

Most of the temporary appointments teach low-level classes with multiple sections. When the teachers are gone, the class sections will have to be cancelled.

About 500 students were affected earlier this semester when 24 classes and sections were cancelled in the College of Arts and Sciences. The cancellations saved about $150,000 in the fiscal year 1990 budget.

Coffman said the final decision on class cancellations probably would not be made until next August. "Right now, we're working on a day-by-day basis," he said. Coffman said the needs of students meeting graduation requirements would be given priority. The University then would try to take care of students already here. "The crucial time will be the June enrollment period," Coffman said. "People that enroll after June may be facing some problems." Money could also be cut in several areas where K-State has been trying to improve.

Included in this category would be money targeted to improve library materials, computer equipment and instructional materials, Coffman

"We're looking at cutting about a million dollars in these areas," he Larry Moeder, associate director of Office of Student Financial Assistance, said the recent cuts in K-State's budget may have some effect on student financial aid programs.

Whether the University will be hiring fewer student employees will vary according to the individual departments, he said. Each college is responsible for its budget, and some colleges may choose to hire fewer student employees to counteract a lower budget.

Moeder predicted the number of employees in student financial assistance wouldn't be affected by the cuts, because its primary sources of operating expenses do not come from state funds.

Student financial assistance receives 4 percent of the campus-based financial aid programs for administrative overhead costs. Moeder said this would include the college workstudy program, the Perkins Loan program and the Supplemental Educational Opportunities Grant

The office receives a $5 allotment from the U.S. Department of Education for each Pell Grant recipient at K-State. He said the $10 Student Loan Administration Services fee also provides a source of income for their expenses.

Moeder said two major sources of student employment, the residence halls and the K-State Union, will not be affected by the cuts. He said these are separate agencies which operate from their earnings and do not rely on outside sources for funding.

Clantha McCurdy, Board of Regents Director of Student Financial Aid, said two programs operate on the state level that will be affected by the budget cuts: the Kansas Board of Regents State Scholar program and the state work-study program.

Area residents will vote on construction of new USD 383 middle school

By Shannan Seely Collegian Reporter

Residents of USD 383 will voting today on whether to pass a bond to help alleviate overcrowding and other problems in the Manhattan school system.

The proposed project, which will build a new middle school, will total $15.38 million. The bond package is $14.38 million, and the remaining money will come from interest on the bond money

The number of students has increased 900 in the last six years," said superintendent Hal Rowe. "Options such as year-round school, higher class sizes and building additional space were considered. A poll was done and building additional space was what people preferred."

The bond will fund only Phase I. Plans for Phase II include building a new elementary school, but will not be proposed for a few years. Phase II depends on school enrollment and capacity needs at that time, Rowe said.

About $9,352,000 will be spent on building the new middle school, which will have a capacity of 1,000 students and will open in fall 1992. Rowe said.

"If the bond passes, we will have kindergarten through fifth grade in the elementary schools, sixth and seventh grade in the new middle school, eighth and ninth in the existing middle school and ninth through 12th grade in the high school," said James Rezac, Manhattan High School principal. "That will solve all our spacing problems,"

The bond issue will also pay for the installation of air conditioning in the high school. "It's the only school in the district that does not have any," Rezac said. More than two years ago, Rowe informed the board of education that enrollment would grow along with the challenges associated with this growth.

Several groups reviewed options to deal with increased enrollment, including a core committee of community members studied answers to the problem. A consulting firm was hired to research the community's growth of students in the next few years.

Ron Marstall, arts teacher for Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson schools, said because of current limited spacing, he does not have a home room and must haul art supplies to each room. Marstall carries buckets of water to the rooms because they lack

"The problem is that most music and foreign language teachers don't have a room or office space," he said. "It's kind of tight."

Marstall said mobile units are used as temporary classrooms. Each mobile unit has two classrooms.

Rec expansion plan prepared

Current student fee to finance project

By Julie Wakeman

A draft report prepared by the Recreational Services Task Force recommends an expansion of the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex that could cost students $6

The report recommends the expansion be financed through a $22 fee that is already being collected. The fee is currently being used to pay off bonds issued to finance the construction of the K-State Union, KSU Stadium and the original construction of the recreational complex. These bonds will be paid off by 1994.

The expansion would have to be approved through a student referendum that will probably take place in November, said Raydon Robel, director of rec services.

Robel said the preliminary recommendation was proposed to Student Senate Thursday and that the task force will continue working on the feasibility study to determine exact cost and square footage details by summer.

Todd Johnson, student body president and task force chairman, said rec services has set aside $5,000 to hire an architect to get an idea of what will and won't work with the additions.

"The task force will recommend to the Student Academic Affairs and University Relations committees to write the bill for Student Senate to go to referendum, which will require a majority vote of the Senate," Johnson said. "If that passes, it will go to a referendum vote of the student body."

With a successful referendum, Robel said the process will continue with the appointment of an associate architect from

The addition would be paid for with money the students already pay for bond issues in the original construction of the rec. It would just be restructured without any additional fees.

-Raydon Robel director of rec services the state. Within one year, the bidding process would begin and construction would last nine to 10 months. Robel said by summer or fall 1992, the new additions would be completed.

"Basically, it's up to the students," Robel said. "The addition would be paid for with money the students already pay for bond issues in the original construction of the rec. It would just be restructured without any additional fees."

However, Johnson said due to the minimum wage increase, the three dollar recreational services fee will need to be increased. He said the only increase in student fees to accommodate the addition would be in this fee. Dallas Johnson, faculty representative to the task force, said the addition is needed because during the high demand times there is a lack of space available for the aerobic activities. "During the aerobics times there isn't anywhere for the basketball players to play," he said. "With the expansion of the large gym, there would be space for both activities to go on at the same time." He said he uses the center, but the expansion won't affect him personally, because he only uses the racquetball courts during the noon hour.

Todd Johnson said the faculty and staff fees for use of the center would probably dramatically increase with the new additions.

According to the task force's report, the weight room facilities are too small to accommodate all of its users. This space and the fitness or cardiovascular area will also be increased in size.

The report cites a survey conducted by Recreational Services which shows that 78 percent of students participate in the recreational services program and that students ranked it second to academic programs.

Korean protests escalate

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — President Roh Tae-woo said Monday that South Korea must choose between progress or "the road toward chaos," but dissidents and radical students stepped up violent protests demanding his ouster.

Radicals armed with firebombs, steel pipes and rocks battled riot police and attacked governing party offices in Seoul and several other cities. Dissidents vowed to hold anti-Roh rallies this week across the nation.

As Roh spoke in a nationally televised address, 21 students armed with firebombs and iron pipes charged into the Seoul headquarters of Roh's Liberal Democratic Party and seized a third-floor office.

Riot police overpowered the protesters with clubs and tear gas about 10 minutes later. Witnesses said five people, including protesters and police officers, were injured.

Office windows, furniture and the windshields of three cars were smashed and a guard post was burned.

The protesters scattered leaflets demanding the ouster of U.S. Ambassador Donald Gregg. They accused him of concocting this year's merger of the governing party with two minor opposition groups. The merger resulted in a large conservative governing party.

Salvadorans may be acquitted

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) — A weak prosecution case and missing evidence make it unlikely those blamed for the November slaying of six Jesuit priests and two women will be convicted, a court source said Monday.

The United States has warned El Salvador it could face a cutoff of $85 million in annual military aid if it fails to actively pursue its investigation of the deaths of the priests. The House Foreign Relations Committee has approved a proposal to that effect.

The source at El Salvador's 4th Criminal Court, who insisted on anonymity, told The Associated Press he believed Col. Guillermo Benavides, commander of the Military School at the time, three lieutenants and five soldiers charged with the crime stood a good chance of being acquitted.

The source said the only evidence introduced against Benavides is testimony from other suspects. Under Salvadoran law, a person accused in the same case cannot testify against a codefendant.

"The evidence makes it difficult" to convict Benavides, the principal suspect, the source said.

Cuba blocks U.S. broadcasts

WASHINGTON (AP) — Cuba announced Monday that U.S. government radio broadcasts beamed to the island will be jammed 24 hours a day, a move that drew a critical response from the Bush administration.

The action marked the latest escalation in the electronic war between the two countries.

Cuba began jamming the Voice of America's Radio Marti broadcasts during the pre-dawn hours last month, then started interfering with programming between 6 a.m. and noon.

After the announcement Monday that jamming would be carried out around the clock, the VOA issued a statement saying, "We deplore this action, which is clearly designed to deny the Cuban people access to uncensored information."

The jamming of the broadcasts first began shortly after the agency started testing TV signals to Cuba on March 27. Cuba has jammed the TV tests each day since then.

White House: No hostage deals

WASHINGTON (AP) — The White House, reacting to former hostage Frank Reed's plea for negotiations to free his comrades still held in Lebanon, reiterated Monday that it would make no deals.

"You cannot let terrorists think they can steal American citizens and beat them up and just steal more and more and more and more," presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said.

Reed, who was released April 30 after 44 months in captivity, said Sunday he was brutally beaten by his captors and kept in isolation for more than two years.

He pleaded with government leaders to negotiate for release of hostages "even if you have to get in bed with the devil."

But Fitzwater told reporters "you cannot let kidnappers take people off the street and make deals for them."

Hayden criticizes Carlin

WICHITA (AP) — Gov. Mike Hayden launched attacks against former Democratic governor John Carlin and state legislators Monday during visits to Wichita and Pittsburg.

At a Wichita news conference, Hayden said he welcomes Carlin to the gubernatorial race because there are of vast differences between him and the former governor. Carlin, a Democrat, formally announced his candidacy Monday.

"For 13 months, I was an infantry officer in the jungles of Vietnam. I always wondered where John Carlin was in those days. I guess he was back on the farm in Smolan," Hayden said.

At the time Hayden served in Vietnam, Carlin was in his mid-20s, was married and had a child.

After that remark and Hayden's previous mention of Carlin's several marriages, the governor was asked if he planned to wage a campaign peppered with personal attacks.

"I certainly am proud of my service to my country and I am certainly also proud of my strong belief in traditional family values," Hayden said.

Hearing set for student

A K-State student appeared in Riley County District Court Monday to have a date set for his preliminary hearing. Ramon N. Davenport, senior in criminal justice, is being charged with rape and will appear in court June 5.

At Monday's appearance, the attorney for the state, Gabrielle Thompson, questioned the amount of Davenport's bond, which was $1,000. Thompson wanted the court to increase the amount to $10,000.

The amount of the bond is not consistent with the severity of the offense, Thompson said.

Davenport's attorney, Maritza Segarra, said the reason for the bond is to ensure the accused appears in court. Davenport has made both of his scheduled appearances in court, Segarra said. The court denied the request to increase bond.

The state did not present any new information concerning the case at the appearance, but Judge Harlan Graham told Davenport not to have any contact with the rape victim or leave the court's jurisdiction until the hearing date.

Graham suggested the Riley County Attorney's Office and the Riley County Police Department reevaluate booking procedures.

Davenport was arrested April 28 after allegedly raping a female resident of Moore Hall, where he was a resident at the Pattle Robertson, gallery manager of the Strecker Art Gallery, hangs one of Dean Mitchell's watercolor paintings. Mitchell has paintings entered in the Hubbard Museum Art Show in New Mexico, a competition open by invitation only. The winner will receive $250,000.

By Heather Anderson Collegian Reporter

At first glance, Dean Mitchell's artwork looks like photography.

But it's not. Mitchell, a 33-year-old artist from Kansas City, Mo., works in watercolor, acrylic and oil paints, pen and ink, pastels and pencil. His work is so detailed, it can easily be mistaken for a photograph.

Mitchell's work is on display at the Strecker Art Gallery in downtown Manhattan. Later this month, the gallery will put on a show for him at the Weston Hotel at the Crown Center in Kansas City, Mo.

Although much of his work on display at the Strecker Gallery is detail-oriented, Mitchell said he uses other styles.

"Some of my work is very meticulous," he said. "But I can go from one extreme to the other, and it just depends on my mood."

Mitchell said his most current works are generally more abstract than previous works.

"It's been a plus, to be able to do different things," he said. "As a young painter, it has definitely made an impact on me financially."

Although recent articles about his work in art trade publica-

Artist's works feature precision

tions have increased his popularity, Mitchell said he used to have to work as an illustrator to make ends meet.

"A young painter can't price his works high enough in a market of older painters to make a living," he said. "Apparently, there is a stigma in this country against young artists. Collectors are afraid to invest in young artists — afraid, I guess, that they won't stick with it. A lot of young painters aren't going into fine art, because they can't make a living at it."

Mitchell said he doesn't attend many of his own shows so people won't know his age.

But there is also another quality of Mitchell that he doesn't necessarily want collectors to know. He is black.

Mitchell said many people expect black artists to create African-type art, something that is not his style. In fact, he said he has been rejected from predominatelyblack galleries because his works aren't "black enough."

"It seems that in America, black people have not reached a sense of identity," he said. "What I feel and paint is from a human standpoint, not a racial standpoint. I was born and raised on American soil, so what my work reflects is an American heritage, not an African one."

Two of Mitchell's paintings are entered in the Hubbard Museum Art Show in Ruidoso Downs, N.M.

The first-place winner, to be announced June 2, will receive Mitchell is the youngest artist entered in the contest, which is by invitation only.

Julie Strecker, gallery owner, said Mitchell's work is in great demand.

"His work sells as fast as he can produce it," Strecker said. When I started showing him two years ago, his paintings sold from between $100 to $1,000. Now, they run anywhere from between $3,000 to $10,000.

"He has a uniqueness of vision," Strecker said. "Partly, it's the way he frames the subject."

Mitchell's subjects, although somewhat traditional, are often painted in a non-objective way.

"Representational pieces have been done for years, and I wanted to find a way to do them differently," he said. "A lot of times, the way I crop the subject is too severe for museum directors or traditional viewers.'

For as long as he can remember, Mitchell said he has always wanted to be an artist.

"I can't remember wanting to do anything else," he said. "Initially, my mother wasn't that supportive of my art, because she was afraid I wouldn't be able to make a living.

Even though Mitchell's paintings are now bringing in thousands of dollars each, he said that money is not his primary drive to create art.

"I feel like I'm contributing something more to the world besides making a living," Mitchell said. "The arts are a spiritual kind of thing something everyone can relate to as human beings."

Drug cartel tries missile purchase

Cocaine profit used in deal; Colombians target, FBI says

By The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. - Two Colombians who claim links to the Medellin drug cartel were in custody Monday, accused of trying to buy Stinger missiles to use against aircraft carrying Colombian officials, the FBI said.

The men agreed to hand over $1 million in cocaine profits as the down payment for a "substantial number" of the anti-aircraft missiles, federal authorities told reporters.

FBI officials said a Stinger sells for about $14,000 on the legitimate arms market. The shoulder-fired missile uses an infrared homing device to aim itself at the heat generated by an aircraft's engine. It has proven highly effective against low-flying aircraft.

The 4-foot-long, 35-pound missiles were to be used against official Colombian government aircraft, according to Allen McCreight, FBI chief in Tampa.

But he said investigators weren't aware of specific plans by drug traffickers to assassinate Colombian President Virgilio Barco Vargas, who has waged war on drug smugglers, or his cabinet.

"Our investigation is continuing, but at this point we have not established that the purpose of the purchase of the missiles was to be used against any officials and specifically the president of Colombia, McCreight said.

ABC News reported Sunday that the Medellin cartel had offered nearly $6 million for more than 100 Stingers and 1,000 machine guns. The New York Times put the number of missiles at 24. Federal officials Monday did not specify the number of missiles sought.

The case is the most recent of several reported attempts by drug traffickers to obtain Stingers, but federal officials say none of the earlier negotiations had gone as far as the plot involving the two men arrested Saturday. An undercover drug investigation in Polk County in west-central Florida eventually led to the federal "sting" in the weapons deal.

"I think this shows a correlation between narcotics and terrorism," said Polk Sheriff Lawrence Crow. "This time, instead of Stingers, the cartel was stung," said Bonnie Tischler, head of the U.S. Customs Service in Tampa.

Authorities arrested Alfredo Antonio Ramos-Tinoco, 47, at a Tampa hotel bar, and Luis Fernando Arcila-Giraldo, 28, near Miami International Airport.

Both were charged with conspiracy to receive stolen property and export arms illegally, as well as aiding and abetting the importation and possession with intent to distribute marijuana and cocaine.

Ramos-Tinoco appeared before a U.S. magistrate Monday in Tampa, but the hearing was recessed after Ramos-Tinoco said he wanted an attorney but couldn't afford to pay one. Magistrate Thomas Wilson told the public defender's office to represent Arcila-Giraldo appeared before a magistrate in Miami.

An FBI affidavit said Ramos-Tinoco "described Luis as a close associate" of Colombian drug boss Pablo Escobar. It also said Ramos-Tinoco "stated that if this arms exchange deal went well, it would be arranged for the undercover organization to handle future transportation of drugs into the United States on behalf of the Pablo Escobar group."

However, McCreight cautioned: 'We have not established these negotiations were directed or controlled by Pablo Escobar."

At a news conference in Miami, FBI agent William A. Gavin said there was at least one more potential suspect, but that a decision on whether to charge that person would depend on how the case unfolded. He also displayed firearms seized from a Miami house where the two had stayed. Among the guns were a MAC-10 machine gun with silencer, an AR-15 assault weapon, and a 9mm automatic weapon.

The traffickers were shown a Stinger brought in from Fort Stewart, Ga., Crow said, but no weapons exchanged hands. Federal authorities said there also were discussions of importing narcotics.

Officer says police force training lacking

want this column to bring to light to the officers of the K-State Police, students, faculty and staff the reason I brought forward the information contained in certain news stories which ran earlier this semester.

The news articles to which I am referring include the article on a lack of training among campus police officers and a sexual assault victim's case which was misidentified because of lack of departmental training. I want everyone to know this was a large undertaking for me and it was not something I did without thinking about it first.

I am sure there is a question in a lot of people's minds: Who is this Ron Wood? I am a former K-State Police officer. I worked for the Junction City Police Department for about seven years. While in Junction City, I was involved in patrol, crime scene investigations, traffic investigations, field training, domestic violence, high speed chases, foot pursuits, felony and misdemeanor arrests and

Yes, it is a sad fact that people in our society are killing people and those same people are killing police officers. People ask how a police officer beats the odds of getting killed. The answer is simple - you train and you

You train on staying alive - that is the first priority. You are no good if you are dead. If you are dead, you can't help your fellow police officers, you can't help the citizens you serve and protect, you can't help anyone. You can't learn all about police work in a classroom. You need the practical application that comes from the street. You learn the basics in class and then you apply what you have learned with the case investigations you come in contact with. If your caseload is light or if your department's officers do not get involved in the constant serious crimes, you train and "role-play" those types of crimes so if the time comes, you are prepared.

You also learn from your own mistakes, and God knows I have made my share. I chased a burglary suspect one night in Costa Mesa, Calif., in 1979. I was alone, I had no backup or any formal police training. I was a security officer. I was stabbed 12 times that night and left for dead. There were two suspects, and the one I didn't see is the one who got me. Police officers are taught to always assume there is more than one suspect. It's the one you don't see that can kill you. Sure, it sounds stupid to do what I did, but in a tense moment you revert back to how you have been trained. If you have trained poorly or not at all, you will react in that fashion.

Some police officers believe they don't need any other training because what they learned in the Academy was enough or because they have been police officers for 10 or

Some people would say K-State police officers don't need all this police training because nothing ever happens at K-State, right? Wrong. In the two-year period that I worked for the campus police, I was involved in numerous felony arrests. Remember the incident involving President Wefald when he Ronald J.

GUEST COLUMNIST

was attacked in his office by Marlin Ray? How about the incident where a suspect led law officers on a high-speed chase from Topeka that ended on the K-State campus after a traffic collision? The suspect exited his vehicle with a .44-caliber Magnum in his

When I first started working for the campus police department, I saw the need to upgrade the training in areas I have already mentioned. I approached Police Chief Charles Beckom with my intentions. The budget came into play when I wanted to rent some police video tapes on officer survival, so I used my money and my off-time to put together a slide presentation on cover and concealment. After the class, the officers thanked me for the presentation and told me it was one of the best training classes they had seen in a long time. What I was hearing was that the officers wanted this type of training but were not getting it. Why?

I tried to put together another training class about two months later. I was told the administration was upset about my last class. I was told they did not like some of the language I used. I was told it was aggressive and I would not be teaching any other classes.

Beckom said to use foul language during a training class was wrong and it did not say much for the presenter. Strong use of the English language is something officers deal with anytime they come in contact with people. Remember, I was teaching police officers, not the general public. I was teaching behind closed doors.

uring the time I spent at K-State, I observed many problems in the area of police management. I found that it was not the police officers' lack of concern for their jobs. Oh sure, there are those who sit in parking lots and do nothing, but most of the officers care about their jobs. Many officers attempted to correct procedural problems but were bucked by the administration.

I talked with one officer who had worked for the department for more than 15 years. He said, "If you just come in and put your eight hours in, don't get too involved, you will be OK." He told me he used to really try to do his job. He said after being constantly challenged on his actions, he just slowed with the rest.

The reason for the news articles was certainly not to embarrass any officers or to say they were not trained or worthless. The primary purpose was to bring to light that they should be allowed competent, thorough training that could enhance their effectiveness as police officers.

The second reason for the articles was to bring to light the widespread practice of deception and favoritism shown by the police administration.

Question - am I a "dirtbag" as quoted by Lt. Robert Mellgren, of the campus police, for bringing information forward concerning the inadequate training policies set forth by the police administration?

Question - am I a "low-life" as quoted by Mellgren for bringing to light the deception, favoritism and poor administrative management?

If I am such a dirtbag low-life, why did the department give me two letters of commendation for a job well done? Why did Training Sgt. Dave Johnson write me a letter of appreciation for being an effective presenter and well-versed in the area of police officer survival at a training class I presented to the department?

Am I a lowlife dirtbag and a worthless individual because I came forward and told the truth that many others wanted to say but didn't due to fear of repercussions? I believe in myself and I believe telling the truth was the right thing to do.

I guess I could have stayed working at the campus police and not said anything. I might have been promoted to lieutenant one day, maybe if I chose to do my eight hours. I don't

Student Senate fails to exhibit initiative

When the going gets tough, Student Senate backs out.

Instead of actually making a decision Thursday about alcohol use at KSU Stadium, Student Senate simply did nothing. A decision against alcohol use could have irritated students, but a decision for its use could have looked bad to the administration.

A competent Student Senate should not be afraid to go against the administration to serve its constituents. Instead, it would discover student desires and make affirmative decisions regardless of what it thinks the administration will do.

Our Student Senate seemed to want to pass the alcohol bill, but didn't because it seemed afraid of the administration. It didn't reject it because it seemed afraid of the students.

Is it Student Senate or not? A bill such as the alcohol issue would have to go through President Wefald and then through the Board of Regents. That is probably not a large feat considering the number of other universities with a similar student alcohol policy. Student Senate didn't even try. What is going Education Sen. John Ryan said that specific recommendations would have to be made on how to implement the bill before it would get a fair hearing.

If that is the case, the question becomes: why didn't Student Senate find some specific recommendations and decide on them? Business Sen. Barry Beck said that drinking laws at the University are hypocritical; they are made to accommodate alumni, not students. This was Student Senate's golden opportunity to eliminate the hypocrisy.

Not doing anything shows that Student Senate cannot handle pressure. It just backs out.

I have never really cried since then. Maybe that seems a little perverse and out of the ordinary, but I didn't. I just have this extraordinary sense of respect.

He told me a year or so ago on his 80th birthday that when he was my age he thought he would be satisfied to live to 80, but I could see he wasn't. He would've liked to live another 80 years, maybe another 100. Maybe forever. Once, I came home from college and sat outside with him on his farm and talked about lots of nothing. It was around sunset and the sky had that Kansas purple-orange-red haze. He asked how I was doing in school and all those busy-talk, nonsense questions family members ask when you come home from college. He couldn't hear very well, or so my family thought, so we all had to shout and enunciate when we talked with him. And, of course, I did my best to shout so he could understand. Maybe the shouting wasn't necessary. He asked then if I was making enough money and what it cost to go to school these days. He was amazed. I imagine he probably bought his land with what I spend each year in search of myself.

We talked a while longer, and all of a sudden there was one of those uneasy silences. Then he did something that seemed really strange to me at the time.

He asked if he could buy me a ham to help me get by. It seemed so weird. A ham. I thought he was joking - he had a way of doing that. But when I looked into his eyes, it

My grandfather was left at an orphanage when he was a child for reasons unknown to me. My family mythology lends itself to the theory that his father ran off and his mother couldn't support them. I'm not sure. But my guess is from that moment on, my grandfather's life had to have changed.

He used to be quite an athlete, they say. He played football, in the backfield, with great success. The old drugstore owner back home, Bob, would tell me that when he got the ball in his hands he'd get this fierce and determined look in his eyes. Those eyes.

After he married my grandmother he sired a family of eight. He supported them on a tiny farm on the outskirts of a tiny town called Alta Vista. Maybe the farm wasn't so tiny back in his day, but now it doesn't seem like anything compared to those big operations with the sprawling irrigation systems and fields that go on forever, like the bankers'

I wonder how tough it was back then. Dad

Casket bearing seems like something you'd at least get a chance to practice or rehearse once or twice, but you don't. You just get up and do it. I was ambivalent about the whole thing. It was an honor, but at the same time I had the realization that I was carrying a box containing my grandfather's life-

Later that evening, after all the funeral hubbub, my dad and I sat outside and talked about him. We went out to the cemetary and looked at the grave. It was really strange because my father and I don't talk all that much. We both try very hard but it doesn't come easy. Being at the grave made it all that more uncomfortable.

It was getting to be sunset. He showed me where all my relatives and other important Alta Vistans were buried. I wanted to cry then and I wanted to hug my dad. But I didn't. It wouldn't have been manly. Dad and I shuffled our feet around and decided we'd had enough, so we left. The sky was purple-orange-red then, too. On the drive back home we talked about the man who conceived the man who conceived me. We talked about the man who gave me a ham to make

Move doesn't help

Editor,

Last week, the University of Kansas's University Senate approved a proposal that ROTC courses no longer be counted for credit toward graduation until the Department of Defense changes its policy of banning homosexuals from earning commissions through the ROTC program. A motion was also passed to ban ROTC from holding commission ceremonies on university property. Unfortunately, this move is affecting the wrong people.

ROTC students are highly dedicated, hard-working students who strive to achieve academic excellence as well as to excel in the military training they receive in preparing to serve as officers in the United States Armed Forces. Their reward is an officer's commission. The courses these students take in compliance with the ROTC training program are different from other college courses only in the focus of application of the skills the stu-dents learn. ROTC students complete oneand three-hour courses in management, history, international affairs and ethics. These courses are not "pud" courses and require students to put in just as much time and effort to receive an 'A' as any other course. To remove application of credit for these courses toward graduation requirements is a grave disservice to those students who choose to participate in ROTC and may or may not agree with the Department of Defense's policy on homosexuals. Why should the students of a chosen profession be penalized simply because they have chosen a profession which has policies a select group of society does not agree with? In my opinion, in refusing credit to students who choose to take ROTC courses, the university is discriminating against ROTC students, while having little or no effect on the Department of Defense's policy on homosexuality in the military.

KU's University Senate is barking up the wrong tree. If the Senate wants to make an impact on the Department of Defense's homosexuality policy, it should be collecting petition signatures and contacting Kansas' representatives in Congress, not penalizing the students who are planning a career of their choice. Maybe then the Senate and the students and faculty of KU will make a positive impact on the policy rather than a negative impact on their own campus and students.

Thanks for support

Because no one should be hungry ... we write to say both thank you and God speed to all K-State folks who worked on food assistance projects at the Flint Hills Breadbasket in the past year.

During the 1989-90 year, the Breadbasket, whose mission is to minimize hunger and poverty at the local level by coordinating food donation and distribution activities, has had its best success ever in implementing its goal largely because of K-State's participation.

In 1989, more than 640 volunteers provided 5,513 hours through various Breadbasket programs. Our records show that almost 60 percent of our volunteers, volunteer hours and the food received came from K-Staterelated groups during the year. Thank you for your help.

In addition, we are proud of your involvement. As an institution of higher learning, K-State is No. 1 in Kansas on participation in community services that benefit the less fortunate. My sense of the national campus scene is that very few universities its size can match K-State's record of community outreach to help others. You can be proud of the fact that through helping social services such as the Breadbasket and others, you have truly contributed to the quality of life in Riley We wish the very best of success to those of you who are leaving to pursue career and other opportunities. Good luck on new en-

Series incomplete

The series on racism at K-State was informative to the community at large. However, the series has two inadequacies that I can see.

The first is that the series implies that African-Americans are the only minority group that experiences racism. As a Native American, I can testify that this is not the case. I can say that all the minorities on campus experience racism including Hispanic-Americans, Asian-Americans and international students.

The second is that the series made no mention of campus offices and activities that attempt to reflect the cultural diversity on campus and promote mutual respect. Among these are the Office of Multicultural Student Organizations, American Ethnic Studies, International Student Center, Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, Martin Luther King Jr. Week, Black History Month, Hispanic Awareness Month, Native American Heritage Month, International Week, International Club, Southeast Asia Studies and International Studies. One evidence on campus of racism is that people tend to think that Native American Heritage Month is only for Native Americans. This is far from the intent of the month. The same can be said for all the other weeks and months that celebrate cultural diversity. All these activities are to promote diversity and cultural understanding among all ethnic groups and dispel cultural misunderstandings.

One of K-State's hidden gems is the American Ethnic Studies program. This is an interdisciplinary secondary major that integrates with any curriculum. In American Ethnic Studies, we look at all racial and ethnic groups represented in America. The ethnic studies major does a research project to complete the requirements for the program. More information can be obtained in Eisenhower 22.

Stewart acknowledges some allegations

By The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. - Missouri's boast of being the only Big Eight school never penalized by the NCAA may be in jeopardy.

Coach Norm Stewart, who has directed the basketball program for 23 years, acknowledged at a news conference Monday that some of the 15 allegations in an official NCAA letter of inquiry are true.

"With regard to the specific allegations contained in the letter of inquiry, I cannot comment much other than to say that the allegations are merely allegations. They are not conclusions," Stewart said in a statement.

"Some of the allegations we have already admitted," he said, apparently referring to assistant coach Bob Sundvold, who was suspended temporarily by Missouri after allegedly buying airline tickets for recruit P.J. Mays of Cincinnati.

"As you know, Bob self-reported his infraction, regarding an airplane ticket, to the athletic director. ... Once the NCAA investigation started, Bob helped obtain written statements from key witnesses and he then turned those statements over to the NCAA for its use," Stewart said.

"Where we have made mistakes which resulted in certain allegations, we will admit them," he said. "Some of the allegations, however, are not true and we will contest those before the committee. I am confident the committee will conclude that no infractions occurred with regard to those allegations which we contest."

Stewart, who is sixth in career victories among active Division I coaches with a 552-273 record, was joined at the 25-minute news conference by Chancellor Haskell Monroe and Athletic Director Dick Tamburo, whom also issued statements and responded briefly to questions. They refused to answer questions dealing with specific allegations or to speculate on what might happen.

The investigation began in Febru-

54, underwent surgery for colon cancer. He said he hopes Missouri's case will be heard at the August 11-14 meeting of the NCAA Infractions Committee in Colorado Springs.

School officials said that, with their internal probe completed, they are confident they can file a response to the NCAA inquiry in time for the August meeting.

The NCAA allegations, Stewart said, do not include academic fraud or big outlays of cash to recruits. But the two most serious may be that Missouri used an agent to help recruit inner-city youths in Detroit, according to several newspaper reports, and that a member of the athletic department "provided false and misleading information" to investigators.

Missouri, which was ranked No. 1 in The Associated Press poll for four weeks last season and won the Big Eight championship, has had several top players from Detroit, including ary 1989, the same month Stewart, Big Eight player of the year Doug

Smith and all-Big Eight guard Anthony Peeler from Kansas City attended a news conference packed with media, alumni and staff representatives, but the players declined comment.

Monroe also said that the university's internal probe, which cost almost $300,000, may have come across two other allegations. He would not specify them but said they would be reported to the NCAA if they are verified.

"Our primary goal is to protect the integrity of this institution," Monroe said. "We have questioned 110 individuals, conducting 150 interviews in 18 states. We are glad the investigation is finally behind us."

Stewart said he and his staff have cooperated fully with the NCAA investigation even though interviews were conducted just before vital games with Kansas and Oklahoma. Everyone at the news conference was given the 18-page official inquiry from the NCAA, with names and places carefully blacked out.

Other allegations include awarding financial aid to a recruit who was not academically eligible; arranging for roundtrip airline transportation between Columbia and a recruit's hometown to obtain information about his high school adademic records; excessive entertainment of recruits, including athletic shoes; arranging entertainment, meals and lodging for recruits; providing meals, transportation and summer camp employment for several prospects; providing cash exceeding the actual cost of transportation to several prospects during their official visits to the campus, and arranging for private tutorial services to help a recruit improve his ACT score. "It is alleged that the scope and nature of the allegations in this official inquiry demonstrate a lack of appropriate control and monitoring in the administration of the ... basketball program by the institution," the NCAA said.

Stewart said simply "no" when asked if he has considered resigning. "From the very outset of the investigation, I instructed my staff and my players to fully cooperate and tell the truth," Stewart said.

"Among other things, I produced over 1,000 pages of documentation during the investigation. Very few mayor college basketball programs could successfully withstand the scrutiny ours has undergone in the last 16 months.

"That is no excuse for our mistakes, but I want to dispel any notion that may have been created that our program is similar to those that have been found to send cash to top recruits, provide players with cars, perpetrate academic fraud, sell tickets or commit any of the other things that we have heard abou! " Stewart said.

Monroe announced the university will institute a new NCAA compliance program.

Varsity crew 8s shell invited to regatta

By Dan Wicker Sports Reporter

K-State crew team members say it is time the sport receives credit where credit is due.

The team has gradually grown from the ground up to produce one of the top teams in the midwest as well as a respected national competitor since the creation of the program in 1963.

"We are kind of the grandfather of the program in this part of the country," said Coach Cliff Elliott. "All of the other programs in the region responded from K-State's."

The men's heavyweight varsity eightshell, consisting of Jeff Proffitt, Jeff Laughman, Mike Janzen, Eric DeBuhr, John Esau, Steve Towne, Grant Hebel and Bob Borberg have been the main reason for K-State's recent success.

This men's eightshell recently returned from the second largest crew meet in the nation in San Diego, where they captured second place in one of the meet's invitational races.

The K-State men also captured a victory at the President's Regatta in Topeka to give them an invitation to the largest collegiate meet of the year in Philadelphia.

The team will leave Wednesday for the Dad Vail Regatta in Philadelphia to compete against 28 schools, including such powers as Georgetown, Temple, Coast Guard, Miami and Cincinnati.

Some of you have been waiting a long time for this. As a matter of fact, it's been exactly four semesters since my first column as sports editor of the Collegian, and this, my friends, will be my last.

In my tenure as the guy who took all the critcism that comes with this type of job, there have been plenty of good things to remember.

The people that I've worked with have to be the best thing about the job, although it's hard to make all of those people happy all of the time.

The things I can remember on the K-State sports beat in the last three years have gone from the hard times of having to deal with all of this year's basketball coaching moves and controversies, all the way back to covering Mitch Richmond as he But I did irritate many of you when made a name for himself on the na-

That's the problem with dealing with sports — the egos. You can cover people, but it's hard to cover egos. They just get in the way of everything else. But, unfortunately, that's what takes up more than it's share of the sports headlines.

That's why it's the good people along the way who make the job that much more enjoyable. Those people can make you forget the bad.

It's the players that respond questionably to an interview request, as to say, "You want to talk to me?", that make the job what it is.

Sure, I get a chance to get closer to all of the big names than a lot of other people, but the big names could care less if you are there talking to them.

it, winning is the bottom line. Just ask K-State baseball coach Mike Clark, who has seen a barrage of reporters this season after putting together what is currently the second-best team in the Big Eight Conference.

His team sat in relative obscurity among the regional newspapers after three straight fifth-place finishes in the Big Eight. This season things have changed — but not Clark.

Clark has always been a great guy to talk to; it's just that, I suppose, nobody thought he had anything to talk about previously.

Most of the so-called non-revenue sports at K-State receive relatively little or no attention if they're not winning. And, although we at the Collegian have tried to generate as much even and positive coverage as possible, we too fall guilty to the "winners get the headlines" theory. It's nothing we as reporters feel all that good about, but nonetheless, it's also hard to tell that to those athletes ery day. Not that those athletes' efforts aren't appreciated, because they are. It's just that it's hard to be as fair as one would like in the world of sports reporting. This is not to say, "Start winning or else take what you deserve," but to say that it's easy to slight one team or individual when another is causing so much of a stir. Readership is one thing, and it is directly proportionate to winning, but I hope the Collegian has also been fair in my four semesters at the helm of what has been an award-

BOSTON — Two plays provided final proof that the Boston Celtics, long the most feared and revered franchise in the NBA, are nothing special anymore.

With 4:16 left in Boston's last game of the season, Larry Bird missed a shot that's tough to miss a reverse dunk that would have cut a New York Knicks lead to 103-101.

Later, scrambling to beat the 24-second buzzer, the Knicks' Patrick Ewing desperately threw up a 3-point shot. It went in.

the remaining 2:02 of Sunday's 121-114 victory was a formality. The victory broke the Knicks'

26-game losing streak at Boston Garden and made them just the third team in NBA history to capture a best-of-5 playoff series after losing the first two games.

There were other reasons: It hurt when Brian Shaw, a productive rookie point guard last season, defected to play in Italy. It forced a reluctant Coach Jimmy Rodgers to stay with 35-year-old Dennis Johnson at that

Johnson played well and ended the season impressively with 21 points, 10 assists and five rebounds on Sunday. His contract is up after the season. Even with Shaw due to return New York had a 113-101 lead and next season, Johnson seems a preferable alternative to current substitutes John Bagley, Charles Smith and Kevin Gamble, although the Celtics may not want him. The future of backup forward Ed Pinckney, a decent rebounder and leaper, also is vague. He started the first 52 games before ineffectiveness led Rodgers to switch to rookie Michael Smith, the Celtics' first-round draft pick. Smith shot well, but shabby defense and rebounding vindicated skeptics who said the Celtics had wasted the pick.

After seven games, Kevin McHale became the starter. Rodgers rarely used Pinckney and Smith even when their particular strengths might have helped. Forward Dino Radja, Boston's second-round pick last year, is expected to join the team after spending this season in Yugoslavia. The addition of Shaw, Radja and a first-round choice this year signals a major roster turnover.

"I don't know" what will happen, Bird said. "I get asked the same question every year when we lose."

Bird, Robert Parish and McHale seem safe as starters, while Reggie Lewis and Shaw should start in the backcourt.

General Manager Jan Volk said he would "take a step back when everything settles down. This is not quite the way I anticipated it to end. I don't think anybody did."

"We may have peaked early," Rodgers said. "I guess timing is

"The third game was our chance," McHale said.

Boilers to be closed

University to lose hot water for 3 days

By Tomari Quinn Staff Reporter

For the first time in more than 20 years, University boilers will be shut down for repairs, leaving the campus without steam.

Lee McQueen, assistant director of facilities engineering, said repair work on the damaged steam lines will require the boilers to be shut down June 1-4. Kansas Power and Light Gas Service will provide electricity to the University for that time span, but the campus will be without hot water for three days.

"We had hoped to do without a full steam shutdown, but the extent of the repairs needed require us to," McQueen said.

He said high-, medium- and low-pressure lines provide power to more than 85 percent of the campus. The medium-pressure lines will receive minor repairs during the shutdown, and will be providing all steam north of the power plant for the rest of the summer.

"The high- and low-pressure steamlines will be shut down through summer," McQueen said. "The medium-pressure line needs extensive work as well, but since it will provide steam during the summer, we need to shut it down to get it down."

McQueen said the high-pressure steamlines are not in good mechan-ical shape and will need to be removed and reinstalled.

"They're deficient mechanically when they're reinstalled they will be up to full mechanical standards," he said. "We're hoping we can reuse all the pipe, and that little will have to be replaced."

The low-pressure steamline will be removed, McQueen said.

McQueen said there is currently a leak in the steamline in a valve near Call Hall. "We've known about it, but we're afraid if we shut the highpressure line down for temporary repairs that we would be unable to get (the system) back on-line," he said. "We'll fix it when we shut down. There's no danger from the valve, but it is wasting energy."

There is an excess of 30,000 feet of steam piping on campus, McQueen said. An estimated 6,600 feet will be repaired or removed this summer.

"The section that is mechanically weakest appears to be at 17th and Claflin," he said.

McQueen said the special maintenance budget for the repair pro-

Nepal.
"I just recently came back after spending five months in Vienna working with ways to help the eight underdeveloped countries of the world," Kaiser said.

The four areas the eight countries will be taken from are Latin America, the Caribbean, Africa and Asia.

The U.N. group tries to develop ways to help people living in these countries learn how to cultivate the land to grow crops. The group also works with ways of preventing early

"There are many programs that will ensure that individuals, as they age, will remain productive members of the community, both socially and economically," Kaiser said.

Much more emphasis is placed on the developing countries than on those already developed, Kaiser said.

As for now, Kaiser and the U.N. group are undertaking a two-year project that will look at aging and development issues in the eight underdeveloped countries.

"This will not just tell us how to keep them alive, but the overall increase in the length of the lives of the inhabitants," he said. "We will also look at how to establish policies in the aging realm."

Kaiser began working in the field of aging when he was in the ministry. I was in the ministry from 1965 to 1977 in Junction City, Beloit and Salina. I worked in nursing homes and became interested in the phenomenon and did a lot of research," he

Kaiser is also involved with the KSU Community Service program. He is the director of the program, composed of K-State students who volunteer to help small, rural com-munities rebuild buildings after disasters and help with general repairs to prolong the town's livelihood. The volunteers go to area communities to help with projects, rebuilding, repairs and general com-munity service, Kaiser said. He is also the acting director of the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives. Even though all these activities keep him busy, Kaiser said he enjoys being a faculty member at K-State.

"It is a privilege to have this opportunity open to me," he said. "It's a world of excitement out there to meet people on a personal basis. My life is filled with fun."

Quality Education— Quality Future....

As a City Commissioner and past Mayor of Manhattan, I've spent considerable time thinking about and developing ideas that will positively contribute to Manhattan's future. Now I'd like to ask your help in preparing for Manhattan's future.

If there is one thing certain about Manhattan's history, it's that the people of this city have always had a strong commitment to public education. I share that commitment.

Quality public education is an important economic development factor, but it's more than that. Quality education can not only bring about more jobs, but it will help to provide better jobs, better opportunities and a higher standard of living for all citizens of Manhattan.

I urge you to make an informed decision about the school bond election on May 8, and remember, the only way to insure we will have informed decisions for the future is to invest in quality public education now.

Napping disturbs patterns

By Todd Ubben

Napping may seem to be the perfect way to make up for lost sleep, but naps may disturb regular sleep patterns. Fred Newton, director of University Counseling Services, said napping may help restore the body during sickness, but is not recommended to improve sleep at night.

"If it's for study, I would not nap, if napping is defined as actually going to sleep," he said. Sleep invokes a typical 90- minute to three-hour cycle that is disturbed upon waking.

"If you wake yourself up a half hour after going to sleep, you'll usually find you're kind of headachy, you're drowsy, you're not real clear, and so that almost is worse than not doing anything," Newton said.

Instead of napping, students who have missed out on sleep the night before should wait it out and go to sleep at the regular time, he said.

Other forms of relaxation, such as music and quiet walks, make better study breaks, Newton said.

Sleep is often used as a form of escape for people going through a state of depression, Newton said.

"I don't think too many students complain about sleep as the sole problem," he said. "It's usually a symptom of other problems."

Sleep needs also vary from person to person.

'Some people will claim that they can take a three-, four- or five-hour sleep and be okay," he said. "I know some college students that can get away with that for three or four days of a minimum amount of sleep, but then they crash on the weekends."

All-nighters used by students to create more study time often result in the mind going blank the next day, Newton said.

"You're really at a minimum performance moment when you've exhausted yourself with mental activity preparing for it," he said.

Pills, sugar and caffeine drinks used to combat sleepiness are not recommended either, Newton said.

"You always get a little peak off that, but you always have a consequence, which is a pretty significant downside," he said. Loren Helmuth, junior in computer engineering, said he usually gets six hours of sleep at night and tries to take a oneto two-hour nap in the afternoon to refresh himself.

"I've always been kind of a night person," Helmuth said. "Even if I wanted to get to sleep before 1 a.m. or so, I probably couldn't do it."

NATO alliance upsets Soviets

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - NATO's secretary-general rejected Soviet calls for German neutrality on Monday, saying a newly unified Germany must not only stay in the Western alliance but remain a base for its nuclear weapons.

"Our goal is clear — we don't want a denuclearized Germany," Manfred Woerner told reporters.

Woerner conferred with President Bush before leaving for a NATO meeting in Canada. It appears that despite weekend talks over the future of Germany, Moscow has not yet accepted the Western allies' insistence that a reunited Germany be a member of NATO.

Asked after his 30-minute White House meeting if the Soviet Union has reconciled itself to the idea, he replied, "As far as I know, not yet."

Woerner said the alliance has a lot of work to do in defining more clearly its political and military roles, amid the revolutionary changes that have redrawn the European political landscape

In light of Bush's call for a NATO summit to address these questions, Woerner said the meeting will "most likely" be held in London the first half of July, but the dates are not yet

Earlier, at a breakfast meeting with reporters, the NATO chief said he fully expected the Soviets to press for stripping nuclear weapons from a united Germany - an option he acknowledged has support among some left-leaning political parties in

But he said that a nuclear free zone inside Europe would "not increase, but weaken, security."

"The essential question is not where nuclear weapons are stationed, the essential question is where they can hit. ... We are in favor of reducing nuclear weapons to an absolute minimum ... but not denuclearizing completely," he said.

At the White House, Woerner also rejected a Soviet suggestion for dual German membership in both NATO and the Warsaw Pact.

"To be a member of both pacts is just neutrality without a word," the former German defense minister

He also sought to reassure the Soviet Union that its security interests would not be harmed if Germany stays in NATO.

"We do not want to change the balance of power to their disadvantage," he said.

Woerner was in Washington for a round of discussions with administration officials prior to a meeting in Calgary, Canada, of NATO's Nuclear Planning Group. The panel is composed of the defense ministers from the alliance's 16 member nations, with the exceptions of Iceland and France.

Bush's announcement last Thursday that he was scrapping plans to modernize short-range Lance nuclear missiles in Europe and to upgrade nuclear artillery shells should be a prime topic at the session.

The updated weapons - designed to fall on East German soil - were deemed politically impossible to deploy, given the developments in Eastern Europe and the prospects for German unification.

The allies must decide when and how they will address Bush's call for East-West talks on the future of short-range nuclear weapons. The president's initiative left unaddressed the future of those shortrange weapons currently based in Western Europe.

At the breakfast session, Woerner said he expected the NATO session would direct the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe, U.S. Gen. John Galvin, to undertake a comprehensive study of the alliance's needs for nuclear weaponry, which will include looking at the pact's airlaunched nuclear systems.

Those systems are accepted by the public in West Germany as a necessary part of belonging to the alliance, he said, adding that he didn't see an "anguished debate" within NATO about their presence.

Asked if he believed that NATO would begin to destroy its older Lance missiles unilaterally prior to negotiations on short-range weapons, Woemer said that wasn't likely given the Soviets' great numerical advantage in such weaponry.

The secretary-general said NATO is "on the move from confrontation to cooperation" and sees itself as "an element of cooperation in a new security structure" for Europe.

"NATO will clearly be one of the essential pillars, if not the essential pillar, in such a structure," he said.

Marijuana use endorsed

House hopeful: drug has future

By Heather Anderson Collegian Reporter

Marijuana has other uses than as mind-altering drug, said Mark Creamer, of Lawrence, who plans to run for 2nd District U.S. Representative in August.

Creamer said that hemp, an illegal variety of marijuana, can be used to make paper, cloth, methanol, cooking oil and food meal.

"It seems suspicious that with all of its positive uses, hemp is illegal," Creamer said. "It grows naturally - it's a weed. It has no natural enemies, so it wouldn't require the use of pesticides or fertilizers."

Creamer said he got most of his information about uses for hemp from the book, "The Emperor Wears No Clothes," by Jack Harer.

However, Ted Barkley, professor of biology, said although marijuana grows freely as a weed it would probably require pesticides if cultivated as a crop.

"If marijuana were cultivated as a crop, sooner or later, it would probably attract diseases and pests - that's the tradition," Barkley said. "Once you start growing things in large monocultures, insects see it as a large dinner table."

He said marijuana requires cool, shady, tropical conditions and nitrogen-rich soil to grow well in large quantities.

"If planted as a crop, it wouldn't be much of a crop around here. The conditions just aren't right," he said. "The only possible profitable market for the plant would be for the drug."

Creamer said although a set-up cost would be involved in the introduction of marijuana as a cash crop, the technology is available for manufacturing.

"In 1938, 'Popular Mechanics' published an article about a new machine to separate the usuable parts of marijuana, much like the cotton gin," Creamer said. "By the time the story got to publication, marijuana had become illegal, so not much more was said about it."

Barkley said that historically, marijuana is one of the earth's ancient weeds, and was used in medieval Europe to make tapestries. The seed of the plant is widely harvested today in Southern Europe for food and bird seed.

From about 1890 until World War I, and to a certain extent during World War II, there was a sizeable industry in growing the plant for its fibers," Barkely said.

He said it was so widely accepted, the USDA produced pamphlets for farmers instructing them how to grow the plant.

Creamer, who has been openly critical of President George Bush's drug policies, said he heard a story that marijuana saved Bush's life in

They say his airplane engine was lubricated with hemp seed oil, the fibers from his parachute gear was made from hemp and even his parachute was constructed with cloth made from hemp. So in effect, marijuana saved his life," Creamer said.

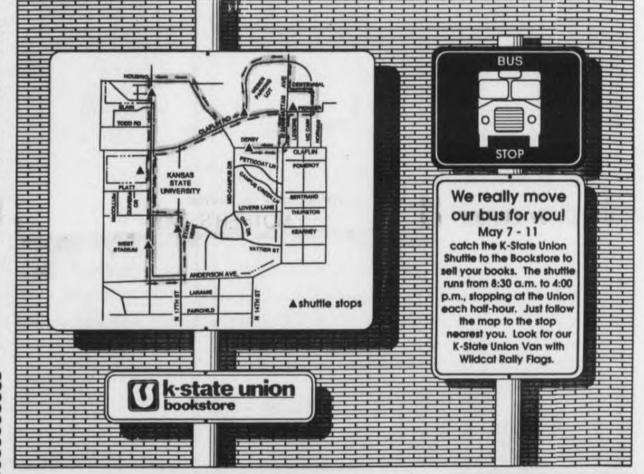

He said he believes law enforcement officials waste time enforcing laws against marijuana, because the drug is less harmful than alcohol.

"I'm an intelligent person, and I'd never put any substance in my body that I know would hurt me," he said. "I've been studying the subject, and I've never found any scientific research that proves that marijuana is more harmful than

"If we're really concerned about our kids, let's take those beer commercials off the air that glamorize alcohol and promote sexual promiscuity," Creamer said. "Violent crimes aren't committed by people who smoke marijuana. Let's worry about crack cocaine, which is more readily available than marijuana in big cities, anyway."

Creamer said he will target his campaign toward Kansas farmers.

"I already have strong support among KU and K-State students," he said. "I need to get the message out to the farmers and all people, not just progressive college students. Marijuana has a bright future as an agricultural product."

Roommate selection process 'serious' matter

University housing officials say 4 questions considered before hall assignments finalized

By Donna Warren Collegian Reporter

A student's roommate is regarded by many as a vital component in helping to ensure happiness and possibly aiding in academic success.

Dave Yoder, director of Marlatt Hall, is responsible for the final matching of roommates in Marlatt. He said roommates affect a student's environment, and a positive environment is crucial to being successful in

"I take (the responsibility) real seriously, because you probably spend more time with your roommate than someone you would be married to, and you spend this time in a smaller space," Yoder said.

Bob Burgess, assistant director of housing, said University housing spends a considerable amount of time every year in trying to make compatible roommate matches for the residence halls.

Burgess said when people apply to their top three choices of buildings in which they would like to live. If they already know someone they would like to live with, they write this name on the application. If the choice is mutual, every effort will be made to pair them as roommates.

In addition, the applicants are asked to indicate which is more important - the dorm they requested, or the roommate they requested.

This is necessary because the applications are dated as they are received and dorms are assigned on a first-come, first-serve basis, Burgess

If one person's application is received in time to be assigned to his first building choice, and the mutually chosen roommate's application is received after the chosen building is full, it is necessary to know which option is the most important to the students, Burgess said.

Burgess said about one-half of the live in the residence halls, they list applicants request a specific rooma particular person, otherwise known as going potluck.

Kim Svaty, sophomore in pre-nursing, said although people she knew from her hometown were coming to K-State, she decided to not pick a roommate.

"I went potluck because I had heard if you lived with one of your old friends from high school, you'd be enemies by the end of the semester, and I also wanted to meet new people," Svaty said.

Burgess said although assigning unrequested roommates is called potluck, there is a method to the process. He said the Department of Housing uses four questions on applications to assign potluck roommates.

The first and second questions ask if the person smokes or objects to having a roommate who smokes. The third and fourth questions ask if the person usually stays up past midnight or rises before 8 a.m.

"By reviewing past research on roommate compatibility, these four appear to be the most important factors in guaranteeing a successful match," Burgess said.

Yoder said he believes students' mate and the other half do not request sleeping times are the most important factor in having a successful roommate match. He said the smoking factors are also monitored closely because smoking is becoming more of > Yoder said he receives a computer printout of suggested matches from the Department of Housing, then reviews the list and makes the final decisions. He said this is done because he may know something about the applicants the computer does not

> Once the residents move in, if someone wants a different roommate, a request form is completed for "The reasons for wanting to change roommates vary from finding an old friend and wanting to live with him to not being able to stand the current roommate," Yoder said.

Virtually every disagreement is a two-way street, he said, and the floor staff are available for help in the Students who do not live in the residence halls use their own methods in choosing roommates.

Karen Folger, sophomore in marketing, said she chooses to live with friends who are tidy and who go to bed and wake up at about the same time as she does.

Christa South, junior in speech pathology, and her roommate placed an advertisement in the classifieds to help them find a third roommate for next year.

"Our other roommmate we have this year is getting married, and we didn't want to move, so we decided to try and a find a new third person to live with us," South said.

South said after discovering all of her friends already had living arrangements for next year, they decided to see what responses they would get from a classified advertisement.

"We were mainly looking for someone who would fit in with us personality-wise and who was also reliable," South said.

Bush wants debate in budget dealings

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - The White House put aside President Bush's pledge against new taxes and said Monday that talks to strike a budget deal with Congress will have "no preconditions.

Although Bush's position on taxes is well-known, he wants an open debate unfettered with conclusions about his past positions, said his press secretary, Marlin Fitzwater.

Republicans involved in talks on Capitol Hill praised the White House's acknowledgement that all ways of reducing the deficit would be negotiable.

That's the only way he can do the job," said Rep. Bill Frenzel of Minnesota, ranking Republican on the House Budget Committee.

"There isn't any president who hasn't tried to make good on his promises," Frenzel said. "There's no president who hasn't lived through times that change and maybe outdate some promises."

But Sen. Pete Domenici of New Mexico, senior Republican on the Senate Budget Committee, predicted it would be tough to pass a budget that includes tax increases.

"It would be hard to get anybody to agree to that, not just Republicans," Domenici said. "The question is overall, how strong is the package in deficit reduction so tradeoffs are the four top congressional leaders with further meetings with lawmakers this week to discuss how to "break the logjam" that has persisted nearly a decade.

He will talk strategy on Tuesday with House and Senate Republican leaders and hopes to hold another bipartisan session later in the week, Fitzwater said.

House and Senate leaders were meeting Monday in the office of Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, D-Maine, to consider the presidential initiative.

"I make no assumptions with repect to any aspect of the budget," Mitchell told reporters.

Fearing that rising interest rates would seriously damage the economy, the administration initiated the budget talks following the recent approval of rival $1.2 trillion budget proposals by the full House of Represenatives and the Senate Budget Committee.

Bush shares with congressional leaders "anxiety over a deficit that is fighting every reduction attempt that we can come up," Fitzwater said.

Bush's own fiscal 1991 budget was never seriously considered by Congress, and the administration claims both House and Senate measures would fall short of reducing the deficit - over $150 billion this year

Summer totals to reach 3,500

By Tim Clopton Collegian Reporter

About 3,500 students are expected to enroll in summer courses this year, which is more than in past summer sessions.

"With summer enrollment it's really hard to predict the total enrollment, because of all the short courses that go on all summer long," said Don Foster, University registrar. "It's impossible to give a concrete number of students that will be enrolled at this

Judith Zivanovic, associate dean of arts and sciences, said according to the trend in preenrollment figures in arts and sciences courses, the student population should be larger than normal for summer sessions.

"I would anticipate enrollment to be larger than last year," Zivanovic said. "We have opened some additional sections this summer, including biology lab, composition II, and several math courses, because some of the sections have already been filled."

Of the students staying in Manhattan for the summer session, about 220 are expected to live in Goodnow Hall, which will be the only hall kept open for students living on campus, said Phillip Schlee, office assistant and summer conference coordinator for the housing department.

"We usually have about 200 students a year (during summer school) stay in the residence halls, and every year that number gets a little bigger," Schlee said. "We've gotten about 80 signed housing contracts back in, so we've still got over 60 percent to come. They usually wait until the last couple of weeks to get them (the contracts) in."

Enrollment for summer term is June 4. Classes begin June 5. Students can go through late enroll-ment June 5 for a $10 fee.

"I just remind folks that if they have not enrolled, they can enroll before the beginning of the sum-mer courses," Foster said. Many non-college students have enrolled in summer courses offered on campus, Zivanovic

Man copes with AIDS

Junction City resident struggling with 'soft' symptoms of HIV virus

Editor's note: "Larry Buckley" is a fictitious name used to protect the identity of the source.

> By David Frese Collegian Reporter

Larry Buckley sat in the K-State Union cafeteria and smoked a cigarette. Behind him, two students were laughing. There was a time in his life when he would have thought, "What the hell are they laughing at?" But that

"My life was pretty terrible there for a while," he said.

In December 1986, Buckley, a 31-year-old Junction City resident, tested positive for the AIDS virus. He is currently struggling with AIDS-Related Complex, one of the larval stages of the virus. He said he is physically well but is showing some of the "soft" symptoms, such as fatigue, leg pains and skin rashes. He is out of the immediate danger of developing full-blown AIDS.

But perhaps the worst symptom of all, he said, is depression. Depression because he's pression because he doesn't know how much time he has left.

"I don't know how long I've been infected," Buckley said. "I hope to make it to 35, but I doubt I'll make it to 40."

It's been a long and bumpy road for Buckley. He said he's been lucky so far because he hasn't had any serious illnesses, but the grueling day-to-day battle against his own body has taken its emotional toll.

Buckley thinks it's irrelevant now where he contracted the virus.

"It doesn't make any difference anymore," he said. "When I first found out I was infected, you know, that was a big issue to me - how I became infected and who infected me — but as time progressed and I came to grips with it, it just wasn't an issue. It doesn't make any difference anymore."

Buckley is homosexual. It wasn't something he wanted, he said, not something he chose. It just was.

"It wasn't a decision," he said, "I always trying to make all the right decisions. De- knew. I didn't understand it. I got married when I was 18, and my wife knew of my sexual history. She didn't understand it anymore than I did, and we both thought it was just a phase I was going through. With marriage and so forth, we thought it would change.

"Well, it didn't change, and neither one of us was happy. So we decided to get a divorce. We were married five years, and I think we gave it a good shot. We have two wonderful children from our marriage," Buckley said.

When Buckley discusses his experiences with AIDS, it becomes apparent it's important to him that his children know and understand what it is he is going through.

"Lifestyle has never really been an issue with them," he said. "As far as my health goes, they understand that I'm infected. They understand what it means. We don't talk about it a lot because they don't talk about it a

School of Journalism regains accreditation

By Melissa Simpson Staff Reporter

The A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications has been reaccredited for the next six years, said Carol Oukrop, director of the school.

Oukrop received a phone call unofficially announcing that the Accrediting Council on Education in Journalism and Mass Communications has approved reaccreditation. A letter from the council officially announcing the reaccreditation was expected later this week, Oukrop said.

"We are relieved, but not surprised," she said. "The nervous part was during the team's visit to the school in October, and it went extremely well."

Paul Parsons, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, said accreditation in journalism schools is voluntary. However, about 90 universities in the nation have accredited programs. "This puts us into the elite category,"

Parsons said.

Oukrop said the state accrediting committee recommended the school be reaccredited to the accrediting council in April. The committee found no deficiencies in any of the 12 standard evaluating criteria, and the accrediting council also found no deficiencies in the school.

"We felt that reaccreditation was coming," Parsons said. "It's a three-stage process, and once we knew we had been recommended we slowly had to wait for it (actual reaccreditation) to occur."

Accreditation for the school lasts for six years. After six years, the school must be re-evaluated.

The school was denied reaccreditation in 1986 because of failure to comply with a requirement that journalism and mass communication students must complete 90 hours of course work in departments outside the school.

VOTE HERE

Dorothy Young, Ruby Weik, and Marilyn Davenport, all of Manhattan, supervise voting Tuesday in Derby Food Center for a USD 383 bond issue to construct a new middle school in Manhattan. Area voters rejected the proposal, voting 3,788 against and 3,208 for the bond.

Voters reject bond proposal

USD 383 overcrowding situation remains problem for area students

By Shannan Seely Collegian Reporter

The $15.38 million bond issue for the new USD 383 middle school failed to pass Tuesday.

Of the 17,719 registered voters in the district, 3,788 voted against and 3,208 voted for the bond. Voter turnout was 10 percent higher than expected, and 40 percent of all registered voters.

"Obviously, we will assess the election when the Board (of Education) gets together," said Jim Lindquist, president of the board. "The thought right now is the 'no' votes were because of property taxes and the school district does not have any control over that."

Lindquist said the board will look at what it needs to do differently before the bond issue is presented to the voters again.

"It (overcrowding) is definitely a problem, and there's definitely a need for the bond money," he said. "It gets worse with each passing

"It's a challenge to find a way to appeal to the negative votes," Lindquist said. "We need to figure out how to inform them. Maybe we need a more intense educational campaign so those voting 'no' will truly understand the problem the district has."

Joleen Hill, board member, said the only way to fund the new buildings is through property taxes. The state does not provide funding for new buildings," Hill said. "Unfortunately, this has been a two-and-a-half-year process, with the best planning ever. There was community input at every stage, and community and town meetings for anyone at any time. "We cannot consciously alter that process," she said. "The plan has logic - it goes beyond emotion. It's a fact that it's well planned."

Hal Rowe, superintendent of USD 383, said the plan came from the community.

"It was a well-conceived plan with a good campaign," Rowe said. "I think it came with an uproar of state legislation and classification reappraisals and taxation."

The Board of Education will meet Wednesday to discuss the failed bond issue.

"I wish we didn't have to do this, so we could spend time doing other things, like running the schools," Hill said. "We are an elected body, and if that's how they (the voters) want us to spend our time, then that's what we'll do."

Requirements for vet college to be lowered

By Bill Sier Collegian Reporter

A change in the admissions requirements for the College of Veterinary Medicine is causing concern among some pre-veterinary students.

"We want to keep everyone involved well-informed as things develop," said Carolyn Roberts, assistant dean of the college.

Currently, the minimum grade point average for entry into the veternary school is 3.0 in the required core-curriculum courses. Roberts said that as of fall 1991, the minimum GPA in these courses will be lowered

"These changes are only temporary for 1991," she said. "We anticipate additional changes in 1992." Admissions requirements for the 1990 school year will remain the same, Roberts said. Students already accepted into the school do not need to meet the new requirements.

In addition, Roberts said that prospective students will now be required to take the Graduate Record Examination.

"We have had several students who had a GPA of 2.8 or 2.9, who have done just fine on the GRE," Roberts said.

In addition, Roberts said, the requirement for nine hours of animal science classes is being done away with.

"We still strongly recommend them, however," she said.

These changes have just recently been approved by the veterinary school faculty, Roberts said. Memos on them have only recently gone out to faculty advisers, she said.

Guy Kiracofe, professor of animal sciences and industry and adviser to the Pre-Veterinary Medicine Club, said the requirements were changed to make it easier for students from other universities to attend veterinary school at K-State.

"These changes were made to allow students who do not have the same access to agricultural courses at other universities the chance to come here," he said.

The courses in animal science only amounted to nine hours out the 70 hours formerly required, Kiracofe

"Only these 61 hours are used to determine the GPA for admission now," he said. "It was the (College of) Agriculture course requirements that were done away with. I don't think there will be much negative reaction from the pre-veterinary that the requirements should change, especially the animal science courses. "I really think that the animal science classes were worthwhile, especially for those students with no farm background," Chilcott said. Heather Simmons, junior in pre-

Professors question tenure, teaching qualification crisis

By Anne Krauss Collegian Reporter

The balance between teaching and research has been a controversial topic on the educational front, and the debate has found its way to K-State.

Tenure at the University is granted on the basis of teaching, research and service to the community, and conflict arises over whether equal value is given to teaching.

I think there has to be a better balance," said Richard Hause, professor in curriculum and instruction. "Often when someone has a strong background in an area, we assume they can teach.' Floyd Price, professor in curriculum and instruction, said while the administration has verbally supported an increased emphasis on teaching, more concrete rewards for superior instruction are necessary. Rosemarie Deering, assistant professor in curriculum and instruction "It would be beneficial to have more tangible rewards," Deering said. "Good teachers need more compensation and recognition to feel free and satisfied with what they are Proponents of increasing rewards for good teaching are not against research, however. "It is necessary to keep up on the latest information, the constant changes," Hause said. "It behooves all of us to remain current."

Provost James Coffman also said the emphasis placed on research, teaching and service is not always equal.

"On a university-wide basis, yes, it is, because the University does have a teaching, research and service mission," Coffman said. "But when you consider it on a individual-byindividual basis, no."

Coffman said the structure of different programs determines the way each element is valuated.

"If you look at extension, the emphasis is on service," he said. "A department with a doctoral program is going to inevitably going to have a greater emphasis on research. Some will emphasize teaching, and many

Top officals say budget cuts erase progress of MOE

By The Associated Press

WICHITA - Top officials of Kansas' three major universities issued statements Tuesday rebuking the Legislature for its 11thhour slashing of $11 million from the state higher education budget.

The three said progress in the first two years of the Margin of Excellence had been erased. University of Kansas Chancellor Gene Budig coordinated statements released simultaneously by himself, K-State President Jon We-

President Warren Armstrong. The Margin of Excellence was a five-year plan of the state Board of Regents to improve the universities it operates. Gov. Mike Hayden didn't recommend funding of the $16 million requested for the third year of the program. Legislators then went beyond eliminating the program and cut an additional $11 million from the higher education budget. The cuts came Saturday as the wrap-up session was winding down. Hayden said at a Monday news conference that legislators overspent and then protected sacred cows at the expense of higher 'Higher education was treated unfairly," he said.

The Legislature had been expected to save by taking more than the $1 million it cut from the highway fund. There also had been speculation budget cuts would be spread around by cutting state aid to public schools. That aid wasn't

The university presidents said the cuts will be felt most "in the critical area of faculty compensation."

Estonia seeks independence

TALLINN, U.S.S.R. (AP) — Estonia dropped the trappings of Soviet power on Tuesday, changing its name and its flag, and proclaimed solidarity with Latvia and Lithuania in the three Baltic republics' drive toward independence.

Without formally declaring independence, Estonia's Parliament reinstituted some paragraphs from its 1938 constitution, including one proclaiming Estonia "an independent republic, with the supreme state power vested in the people."

It dropped "Soviet Socialist" to become simply "The Republic

It dropped "Soviet Socialist" to become simply "The Republi of Estonia." And it adopted its old tricolor national flag in place of the hammer-and-sickle banner of socialism.

Parliament said the steps were meant to show solidarity with sister republics Lithuania and Latvia, which have issued declarations of independence. The deputies also adopted a resolution proclaiming Baltic solidarity and congratulating Latvia on declaring independence.

"The path to our own statehood is not easy, but we are convinced that here in the Baltics, we three — acting together — will arrive at a restoration of our independent states more fruitfully than if each were to struggle on its own," said the statement, broadcast on Radio Estonia and monitored in Britain.

Lithuania is under an economic blockade imposed by Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, in an attempt to force Lithuania to rescind several laws passed since it declared immediate independence March 11. Estonia and Latvia set unspecified transition periods for secession from the Soviet Union.

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — New birth control pills, containing one-fifth as much estrogen as the original pills, are safe for non-smoking women in their 40s and do not raise the risk for clots or cancer, researchers report.

Dr. Daniel R. Mishell, chairman of the Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology at the University of Southern California School of Medicine, and other doctors gave the update Monday on the latest safety studies of the pill and IUDs at the annual meeting of the American College of Obstetricians and

It also was reported that the Food and Drug Administration is expected to approve, perhaps this year, surgically implanted hormone capsules that provide birth control hormones for five years. This birth control method, with the contraceptives usually placed under the skin on one arm, already is used in more

The implants are as effective as daily birth control pills, said Dr. Francine Sinofsky of the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey.

Because of health concerns, most American women stop using birth control pills or IUDs after their prime child bearing years. Studies show that they are used by less than 5 percent of women 35 and older, and that sterilization is now the No. 1 method of birth control among women in the age group.

Slattery to speak at luncheon

Telecommunications, health care, education, farm policies and the national deficit are issues that will effect rural Kansans in the 1990's, according to Nancy Malir, press secretary for Congressman Jim Slattery.

Slattery will speak about these issues Friday at the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives luncheon. The luncheon will begin at 11:30 a.m. in the Landon Room at the University Inn.

"He is concerned about the future of health care in rural areas and the shortage of doctors," Malir said.

Slattery is a founding member of the Rural Health Care Coalition.

Malir said Slattery is also concerned about the effect the national deficit will have on the amount of funding agricultural programs will receive in the future.

Lynda Bachelor, public information officer for KCRI, said Slattery was chosen as the luncheon speaker because of his

"He can let us know what has happened this legislative session with rural initiatives and issues," Bachelor said.

Bachelor said that twice as many people have made reservations for the luncheon than usual, but most of the people are from K-State, and not local small communities.

"I was hoping that area, small town residents would attend," she said. "We put out a general release to the area."

Bachelor said the luncheon is a continuing series focusing on all kinds of rural Kansas issues.

Hours extended during finals

With the increasing need for study time during finals week, some student services have extended operating hours.

Jack Connaughton, associate director of the K-State Union, said the Union implemented late hours April 29, with the general building, including the ground, first and second floor study areas, remaining open until midnight.

The general building will continue to be open until midnight through May 15.

On Monday, the Union Bookstore began opening 30 minutes earlier, at 7:15 a.m., and will be open at this time on Saturday. These early hours will continue through May 16.

The Stateroom cafeteria has extended closing time to 11:30 p.m., which will continue until May 15.

Despite the late hours in these three Union services, the copy center, the information counter and recreation area will operate at regular hours.

Food Service will be open until 11:30 p.m. through May 15 and will open early at 7 a.m. on Saturday. The activities center will close at 5 p.m. beginning Friday and will be closed Saturday and Sunday and May 19 and 20.

Lafene Student Health Center will operate at regular hours during finals. Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene, said the emergency care will operate 24 hours a day, as usual.

Farrell Library will operate at regular hours of 7:30 a.m. to midnight through Thursday and May 14-16. However, Farrell will have late hours on Friday, being open until midnight instead of 8 p.m.

Farrell will be open May 13 from noon to midnight.

Jean McDonald, administrative services officer of KSU Libraries, said students should note that material check-out services will not be available after 10 p.m.

CAMPUS BULLETIN

Campus organizations are encouraged to use the Campus Bulletin. All announcements must be submitted by 11 a.m. one day prior to publication. # Transcripts, ID card fees to rise

Students to pay more for replacements, copies to cover Registrar's expenses

> By Erica Yenni Collegian Reporter

Students will be paying more next fall for transcript copies and replaced student identification cards, said Registrar Don Foster.

Transcripts will increase from $2 to $3, Foster said. After the proposal was initiated in the Registrar's office, registrars met with the student leadership group and got their approval. He said the Board of Regents will approve the increase at the May

"The transcript production is a self-supporting operation within the Registrar's office," Foster said. "We try to maintain a surplus one year, the hole the third year."

Foster said the transcript office lost money this year and needed to increase the fee to make up the funds. Three areas need to be covered by the cost of transcripts.

First, the fee needs to cover the salaries of those involved in transcript production. Second, the proposed increase in postage is estimated to be 30 cents, and third, the fee covers the cost of the equipment necessary to produce the transcripts.

Students will also pay $10 for a lost student identification card, instead of the current $5.

"The primary reason has to do with the fact that the card now has more value to the student," Foster next year break even, and go into the said. "They use their cards to eat in the residence halls, purchase items in the student Union, etc. A lost card has the same value as cash.

"It's the fact that the card has increased value that we feel should be reflected in the replacement cost," he said.

The replacement fee should also provide a portion of the expense of the operating program. Foster said the $5 charge was not covering the cost of ID replacement.

John Wright, senior in finance, did not agree with the decision to in-

"I think the $2 to $3 increase for transcripts seems feasible, but the ID card increase is just another way for the school to suck more money out of the students," Wright said.

He said students who lose their cards can report it to the Union and have the card canceled.

"Most students consider themselves adults and as adults they should be able to keep track of their cards," Wright said.

Repurchasing of textbooks in first stages

By Bill Sier Collegian Reporter

As students open their textbooks for the last time before summer break, bookstores in Aggieville and the K-State Union are gearing up for their semester-end buyback.

Dan Walter, textbook manager for Varney's Bookstore, said K-State students are luckier than those at other schools.

"At some other universities, the students have only one place to buy or sell their books," he said.

"The rush still won't begin until next week, after finals," said Judy Lundberg, textbook manager for the Union Bookstore.

Walter said he also expects the textbook buyback rush to begin next week.

"The people we are getting this week either dropped a course, or are selling left over books from last semester," he said. Kay Farley, Union Bookstore manager, said this is the earliest they have begun buying books back. "Usually, we begin on Wednes-day," she said. "This is the first year we have started on a Monday."

It is also the first time the new store-wide computer system will be used during buy back, Farley said.

"Up to now, we have kept textbooks and other books on separate computer systems," she said. "Now we have them all on one.'

Farley said students who sell back their books for credit on their Wildcat card will get a slightly better deal than those selling for cash.

"We pay 50 percent of the current purchase price when we pay for books with cash," she said, "but students who sell for credit on their Wildcat cards will get 60 percent."

Farley said she hopes students will sell their books back to the Union for another reason, however.

"I hope everyone sells their books back to us," Farley said. "We are a university bookstore, so any net revenue over expenses is returned to the students."

Walter said students should not be too surprised when the bookstores are not able to buy their books back.

"On the average, publishers come out with a new edition every three years," he said, "but that depends upon the subject."

Political science and computer science books tend to go to a new edition even more frequently, Walter

There are many factors in determining the buy back price of a book,

"The price paid depends on whether the book was bought new or used," Walter said. "You get the best prices the earlier you come in."

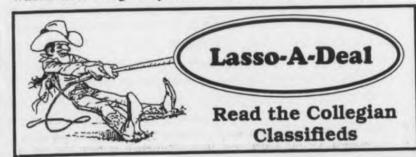

Prices paid for books no longer used at K-State are set by the wholesaler they will be sold to, Walter said.

Darin Pritchett, senior in political science, said it took him two years to find a combination that works for "Books are cheaper to buy from the Union," he said, "I always get a better buy back price from Varney's.

Convenience, however, rather than economics, seems to be the deciding factor in where a student will sell back books.

"It's more convenient to come here," Joseph Martin, junior in elementary education, said while waiting in line at the Union. "Either way, you get the same price."

EDITORIAL

Editor counts cost of being journalist

lways the blank page. Or in this case the blank screen. All journalists face it. Before tapping the keys, the story is brilliant.

This one is more difficult, and I'm afraid it'll just be bad. I don't even have the lead written - something I used to pride myself on. The source has been damn difficult to reach and the story assignment unclear. What does the editor want?

He wants a column on what it's like to work at the Collegian — to be a journalist and try to be a student.

Remember I said try.

And he wants to count the cost of working here — of becoming a journalist. He wants to see the balance between what he's lost and what he's gained.

This should be easy. I've worked here three years. When I stand before my apartment early each morning, I have to remind myself that the key to the newsroom won't open the door.

I think of story assignments like questions waiting for answers. I want to answer the question with a question. Not good. I've been taught that a question lead is a weak lead. I've also been taught that sometimes the rules don't apply.

Assignment: What's it like to work at the

My lead: What's it like to watch a man die? I found out two years ago. I had covered 10-48s before. A 10-48 is an injury accident. A good reporter who wants to be editor runs when "10-48" is broadcast on the scanner. Besides I'd never seen a 10-48 involving a motorcycle.

I wish I never had.

A Fort Riley soldier driving a motorcycle had attempted to dodge a four-car fenderbender in the southbound lane of Seth Child's by swerving into the northbound lane. He hit a car head-on and was knocked back about 30

The windshield and roof of the car he hit were bent into a "v". The woman behind the steering wheel wore white. Her hair was long and blonde. There were cuts on her face and she was bleeding. She held her hands up in front of her face and kept saying, "I didn't see him. I didn't see him.

The only blood I saw on the soldier was from a cut on his right knee where his jeans were torn. Six people were huddled around his head and chest performing CPR and checking vitals.

The defibrilator was brought out. The first time the paddles were placed on his chest, it didn't work. The next three times his body jerked as if he were trying to bridge his neck in a wrestling move. Then they went back to performing CPR and checking vitals. He was

One cop tracing the motorcyclist's path to the collision said, "He did everything he

The cops kept telling the photographer to be careful, to watch where he was walking, this is a crime scene. I worried because I didn't ask any questions of the witnesses.

A Riley County Police Department captain explained it to me later when I called to find out what the report said. It was Driver 1 in a green 19whatever Chevrolet and Driver 2 in a ... and Driver 5 on a motorcycle and Driver 6.

I asked if that was the first traffic fatality of the year in Manhattan. The captain believed so. That was my lead.

I remember the accident so well, I wonder if that's when I began changing.

One night this semester, I was told there had been an earthquake somewhere. It was late. I had to decide if it should go in the paper, and what should be taken out to make room for it.

"How many dead?" I asked. "Seven injured."

"Don't worry about it," I said.

We give something away working here. We gain something. And we become journalists.

To do our jobs we lose ourselves in the doing, the editing, the deciding, the writing, the shooting, the developing of film, the printing of the picture, the layout and the paste-up. Each day we are proving ourselves, as if to say "yesterday's good work was not a fluke." We focus on the work, the quality of writing, the sharpness of the photo, the power of the image. We do that because we don't always like what we have to write about or

But once in a while we stop and see who we were and what we have become.

One day, three years ago, I walked into the newsroom for the first time. Standing there, I decided I wanted to be editor. Along the way I became a journalist. I had no idea of the cost I uring those same three years I've also tried to be a student. If I've turned in term papers that did not show what I was truly capable of, or missed class more than I should, it may have been because I was watching medics try in vain to save the life of a man lying by the side of the road. Or I was waiting for that one phone call to finish that one story. I did those things because I think people have a right to know the circumstances of a man's death or the reasons for a policy decison by a public official. And it's my chosen profession to provide that information. The academic part of the cost, I learned early.

Until late this semester, I thought that was the entire price tag for becoming what I am. I was wrong. And to the friend who showed me the cost, I'd like to say thanks. And you're right, I need to breathe some different air. I'm ready.

FACES OF GRADUATION.

BROADFOOT@'90

K-State should follow KU in banning ROTC

The University of Kansas may be our biggest rival in student recruitment, basketball, football you name it. The competition never ends.

KU beat K-State Friday in one of the most important challenges of all. Its University Senate proposed that ROTC courses no longer be counted for graduation credit until the Department of Defense changes its policy of banning homosexuals from earning military commissions,

It was a moral victory for KU. It recognizes that homosexuals are people - people who have as much right as heterosexuals to earn a living and serve their country.

KU is not alone, More than 25 other universities across the country have condemned the defense department's policy. The actions have come largely in response to recent cases in which admitted homosexuals have been forced to remit their ROTC scholarship money.

It's time for K-State to take a than mere lip service.

stand. In this situation, the most influential action would come from the Faculty Senate, which has a great deal of control over our curriculum. A resolution similar to the one passed at KU needs to be enacted here as soon as possible. ROTC courses could still be offered, but as non-credit hours.

Such a resolution might also prompt the University to amend its non-discrimination policy to include the words "sexual preference."

Homosexuals have few rights. They aren't allowed to marry. They aren't allowed to receive spousal medical and insurance benefits in most places. They often face discrimination and ridicule from the general populace.

Banning ROTC courses from college credit is the perfect way to kick off the administration's new program to recognize diversity. With this action, the Faculty Senate and the administration could prove K-State gives equal rights more

Goodbyes are difficult

ust can't see straight. Just can't see. Is anybody else having this problem, having trouble focusing? It seems like it should be summer, but it's not because I am not at home and I haven't said goodbye to friends. But I keep hearing that familiar sound of lawn mowers and children screaming down the street. I keep feeling at home. But what is home after a year or another year at college? When and if I return home, I always feel like I am walking into people who think they know me and love me, but how can they, when they don't know me. But this can be soothing and private.

Right now, though, there is no privacy. Everything that I have constructed my world around is leaving, packing up and transplanting for the summer. I am too. But it hurts. And I would rather be tying ends of strings together, like saying thanks, love you, goodbye, see you next time, remember me, I will remember you. Feeling grounded in a location, a house, a community, an occasion, these are the memories. So I would rather be sitting in the sun, smiling at friends, making memories. Instead I occasionally force myself to concentrate, to mark off trivial tasks off my list. Perhaps I am not mature enough to see that my college education is forever and friends pass away, but if that's maturity, then let me suck my thumb.

So I am a little bitter and childish. But I have never felt so lost in all the weirdness of finals and the finality of the school year. I will miss the numerous comforting bodies that fill the sidewalks and the Union and the space. You smile at someone in passing and then never see that smile again. You make an acquaintance, you take them for granted, they graduate and you feel loss. Part of me wants to detach. Part of me does not want to sleep, and wants to draw out the end so that day and night are no longer distinct. Part of me wants to sip beer all day in the sun, to self-induce a delirium, so that I can forget the delirium indiced upon me. But most of me would settle for staring at ceilings, preferably one's with water stains or sparkles.

I've been living in this house for almost a year now. Felt like a permanent resident until had to frantically search for another box to live in next fall. Why can't my roomates and I leave the house as it is today - trashed leave it as a museum? So I really don't have a home here except within those familiar voices, smells, looks, laughter of friends, of comforting bodies. I have to pack up all I have collected throughout my stay. I have to sweep up the ashes scattered in a certain spot because my elbow slipped and flipped butts where they don't belong, but where they do belong now.

t's like every year I sweep more under the carpet. And go on. We have to. But sometimes it feels good, you know, life and spring and the breeze that shifts the coiling smoke that lifts from the cigarette between my fingers, up, up, and into nothing. Except the taste lingers and I always will lift another to my lips, eventually.

So I have been listening to loud music in the dark, the sound numbing out the static on my brain. Been driving around, walking around, moving constantly to a rhythm that will leave me when I leave. I left first grade, second, third, but this growing up stuff ... we are all children in grown-up bodies, looking for our unmet needs to be met. We all have the child inside that is saying - RECESS.

Sometimes though I have to ignore that child. Actually, most of the time in this life that I have grown into, I have to ignore my instincts in order to accomplish, achieve, survive, make like a competent being. Children love to learn; they rove around with an inquisitive hunger. So what's happened? Why do I suddenly want to be a pseudo-hippie and let love reign.

There's not much love I find within the classroom, even within the interactions that take place in the classroom. When it does, those are isolated incidents and I cherish them. But I have been finding love outside of the classroom, strangely enough with the people I sit by each day in classes where intimacy is not appropriate.

I learn more from talking to people. People are an abundant source of wisdom, humor, comfort and disturbance. We sell back our books. Not our friends. And so this why I have a restless, angry, sad spirit now, if not always. I want to write poems to friends. I want to sit still in silence. I want to listen to life's little quirks. I want to say goodbye in my mind so that I can then do the business I am here for in the first place.

Goodbye.

Jackhammering at Putnam Hall upsets residents

By Steve Franzen

The final week of spring semester brings books, late nights, tests, stress and jackhammering:

Noise from the renovation of Van Zile Hall has prompted com-plaints from Putnam Hall residents as jackhammering has moved to the hall's foundation.

"I'm less likely to do anything constructive because of it," said David Rowland, freshman in history and Putnam resident who was driven from his room.

"I don't like it. I would be studying," said Aaron Watkins, freshman in journalism and mass communications.

Charles Werring, director of housing, said the department received three complaints by phone on Tuesday from Putnam residents. He said the jackhammering should not last past 4 p.m. today, and if more was necessary, it would be delayed two weeks. "I totally agree with the students," Werring said. The renovation of Van Zile, immediately to the northwest of Putnam, has claimed the parking lots surrounding Putnam, Van Zile and Boyd halls. The noise level produced by the bulldozer and backhoe has increased with the addition of the jackhammer.

The complaints from Putnam residents Tuesday stemmed from the noise of the jackhammer.

"My whole wall is resonating," said Putnam resident Matt Langley, freshman undecided. "I wouldn't study for finals here." Jim Costello, assistant superintendent/field engineer for Building Systems Corp., said the jackhammer was being used to remove part of a below-ground retaining wall on the north wing of Putnam. He said the wall is being removed to accomodate an underground passageway to Van Zile.

The jackhammering will resume around noon today, and will probably be completed by the end of the workday, he said. Costello said if he could, he might hold off with jackhammering until next week. The project is scheduled to be finished on August 6.

Derek Jackson, director of Putnam and graduate student in counselor education and educational psychology, said he hadn't heard any complaints personally, but he did receive a call from the housing department. The department updated Jackson on the construction and assured him it would be finished as quickly as possible.

Van Zile, Putnam and Boyd halls are all part of the Mabel Strong Complex.

Greeks end pledge program

Black sororities, fraternities pass national ruling to eliminate abusive hazing

By Ingrid Erickson Collegian Reporter

Members of K-State's three black sororities and four black fraternities will face mandatory pledge program renovations as a result of a ruling by their national organizations.

The ruling, passed in February, will require all chapters to eliminate the practice of pledging. The organizations passed the ruling in an attempt to discontinue abusive hazing, according to an article in "The Chronicle of Higher Education." The action of the eight national black fraternities and sororities was a direct result of hazing deaths and alcohol abuse in white and black fraternities and sororities. Some of the eight fraternities and sororities had attempted to eliminate hazing by shortening their pledge

The pledge period is the time between the day a student is asked to join a Greek society and his or her initiation as a member," according to the article. Traditionally, this period lasts six to eight weeks. During this time the pledges are often subjected to rituals by active members to prove they have the qualities that merit their becoming active members.

When hazing persisted even in shorter pledge programs, the 800,000 member national organizations eliminated the pledge programs all together. The decision was patterned after the Zeta Beta Tau and Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternities, who were among the first fraternities to eliminate the pledge pratice.

The new practice will go into effect at K-State on September 1, said Tony Massop, president of Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity and the black

State black fraternities and sororities rushed prospective members each semester at orientation meetings. Students wanting to join a particular fraternity or sorority were required to write a letter stating why they were interested in the organization. Active members would then decide on who to pledge based on the letter. During pledge programs of six to eight weeks, the pledges would learn about the organizations founders, ideals and participate in community service

Under the new ruling, prospective members will attend the orientation meetings and learn about its history at that time. The student then writes a letter of intent to the chapter's area supervisor, pays his or her dues and becomes an active member.

Massop said he believes the new procedure will decrease hazing, but

'A person can be hazed even after this process is installed," he said. "Hopefully it will decrease it. Some people view social probation as hazing. An active member can earn demerits and be subject to hazing."

Massop said he thinks the changes imposed by the national organizations will increase the number of students interested in the fraternities and sororities at K-State.

"I hope the black panhellenic will unite with the other panhellenic on campus, and we will receive an increase in members and campus exposure," he said.

About 75 students are members of K-State's African-American fraternities and sororities.

Chapter presidents expressed mixed feelings about the changes

"During our pledge program, you learn about the sorority, leadership, sisterhood, community service and membership bonding," said Felicia Wyms, president of Alpha Kappa Alpha sorority. # 'Cats enter big series at OSU

By David Svoboda Sports Reporter

It was a very relaxed K-State baseball team that leisurely went through its paces at practice Tuesday afternoon at Frank Myers Field.

One player cursed his fate as he broke a wooden bat on his final cut in the batting cage. Several others jumped from their normal side of the plate to the opposite side to make what, in most cases, were very feeble attempts at switch hitting.

Does this team realize it is going to be playing for the Big Eight regular season championship this Friday through Sunday in Stillwater, Okla.?

Yes, it most assuredly does, assistant coach Phil Morgan said.

Morgan, who led the Wildcats during the workout in the absence of head coach Mike Clark, who was on a recruiting trip to Nebraska, said the players and the coaching staff are aware of the opportunity and challenge that awaits them in their four-game weekend series against Oklahoma State.

"The kids have never once been satisfied with just getting in the tournament," Morgan said of the recent clinching by the 'Cats of a spot in the four-team conference postseason tourney. "They knew early on that Oklahoma State was going to be the team to beat in our conference.

"Each time a score was announced and Oklahoma State had lost, our guys cheered. They knew what that meant to them. And they know what this series means to them.'

With the Cowboys on top of the Big Eight with a 15-5 record, K-State (12-8) would have to sweep the series to take the title. If Oklahoma State wins just one, it takes a 10th consecutive league crown.

K-State, by the way, hasn't won a baseball title since 1933.

This is big stuff. "We beat them up here in the last game of the year last year, and our kids remember that," Morgan said. "Our kids believe they can win the thing. They think they're good, and, darn it, they are."

Morgan said K-State will pull out all stops to take the series, and would continue to use its "one game at a time" approach to try to get things done.

"We are going to throw our top four starters," he said. "I can see us doing what it takes to win whenever necessary. If that means starting a reliever, bringing a starter (into the game) in relief, then we'll do it."

The starting pitching rotation isn't yet set for the series, Morgan said. The only likely set members are David Hierholzer and Sean Pedersen, a pair of right showing in a loss at Nebraska may have firmed up his spot once again. That leaves the final spot to be won by either Kent Hipp or Dave Christensen. Hipp missed his most recent start with an elbow injury, and Christensen filled in well and got K-State the win that clinched the tourney berth.

Morgan said the games against Oklahoma State would be important to the team, but not an end-all.

"We want to go down and play as ell as we can," he said. "And what Lefty Chris Hmielewski's strong really matters is how we approach it mentally. If our kids go down there right. If not, then we'll be disappointed.

"If we go out and play as good as we can and lose four, we won't be unnerved by the situation."

Morgan also said the series against OSU will be a key in keeping the team on an even emotional keel in the tourney next week in Oklahoma City.

"Going into Oklahoma State with the fan attitude that they have will help us," Morgan said. "Getting the kind of response we get from that and do what they can do, we'll be all many people can only help us get ready. We're probably going to be playing in front of the biggest crowds we've played before all

Intramurals KSU tradition

By Chris McEntee Collegian Reporter

Intramural sports have always been a good source of recreation at K-State, and, in recent years, intramurals have grown in popularity because of the variety of sports that are offered to the students.

"If you add all 40 of the intramural events together, the total number of students that participate each year is over 21,000," intramurals director Steve Martini said.

Intramurals began in the late 1800s with students getting teams together on their own to compete against each other, he said. Intramurals were the forerunner of college athletic programs, and Martini said K-State has records of its intramural program dating back to the 1930s.

Before the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex was built in 1980, the only place to workout or have intramurals was in Ahearn from six to midnight, Martini said. Although there was not much space available for intramurals, the sports were still very popular because there was nothing else for students to do. He said that, in 1980, there were 410 intramural basketball teams. In 1988 there were 325 teams and this year there were 345 teams. He said that 1988 was the lowest participation year since he has been at K-State and he expects this year's numbers to keep increasing due to higher enrollment.

"The numbers are still really high compared to the number of students at the University," Martini said.

The intramural program offers many different sports so that everyone has a chance to participate, he said. There are the meet sports like wrestling, track and bench press, as well as the major team sports like softball, basketball, volleyball and

"We also have some uncommon sports like wrist-wrestling, team handball and wallyball," he said.

Other events that use to be smaller are now more popular, such as singles and doubles horseshoes, Martini said. Putt-putt is a fun intramural event in the fall, but it does not count for team points. Next a three-point shootout will be added, he said.

The costs are very cheap to enter a team. It is usually $10 a team for each sport or $1 a person for someone who is a single," he said.

Martini said the intramural program at K-State is so successful because the students are so good at participating. He said the program runs very smoothly and there are hardly ever bad feelings toward the

The move came two days after the Celtics were ousted from the NBA playoffs by the Knicks, the first time since 1952 the Celtics were eliminated in the first round in successive seasons. The loss marked the first time the Celtics had lost at home to the Knicks in 27 games.

The Celtics were swept by the Detroit Pistons last season in the first round.

ARLINGTON, Texas - Gerald Perry's first career grand slam hastened Nolan Ryan's earliest exit in five years and the Kansas City Royals beat the Texas Rangers 10-5 Tuesday night for their third consecutive victory.

Ryan (4-2), pitching with six days' rest, got just two outs and gave up six runs. He lasted less than one inning for the ninth time in his career, and made his shortest start since September 1985 while with Houston against Chicago.

Ryan, who had matched the fastest start of his career with four straight victories, lost his second consecutive decision. In his last outing, he gave up five runs in the first inning against the Chicago

White Sox. Mark Gubicza (2-4) stopped his four-game losing streak. He earned run average, but allowed only two hits through six innings before pinch hitter Thad Bosley's three-run homer in the seventh.

Ryan, seeking his 294th career victory, could not get his curveball over the plate and ran into immediate trouble. He walked leadoff batter Kevin Seitzer, Kurt Stillwell singled and walks to George Brett and Bo Jackson forced home a run.

After a fly out, Perry homered over the center-field fence. Ryan has surrendered eight slams, one shy of the major league record held by Ned Garver and Jerry

With two outs, Bob Boone walked and Terry Shumpert hit an RBI double, bringing on reliever Jamie Moyer.

1989-90 provides staircase

Straw to Hernandez. Henson scores 41. Hmielewski dents Brandeberry's roof. Miller named co-player of the year. Mossman resigns; Griffin named interim coach. Kruger headed to Florida. Wildcats stop No. 1 Mizzou. Schildknecht wins singles title.

You can probably picture in your mind many of the preceding events that made being a K-State fan, and also qualify you as an expert rollercoaster critic. With final exams standing in the on-deck circle, it's fitting that this sports year has reached the bottom of the ninth. There can't be much more that can fit into nine changes of a Sports Illustrated swimsuit calendar.

It wasn't a year that featured champagne celebrations for national championships. It wasn't a year that fans were forced to establish permanent residency in the doldrums of viewing incompetent programs. Those scenarios, both fortunately and unfortunately, served as distant barriers for the in-betweeness of Wildcat athletics in 1989-90.

It's hard to call snapping a 30-game winless streak on a lastsecond touchdown pass mediocre. It's hard to call defeating the nation's top basketball team ordinary. And it's not just another day when the cross country team travels to the national championships.

It was events such as these that served as the peaks for a year with unforgettable memories.

Arguably, the play of the year was, as K-State radio play-byplay man Mitch Holthus called it, "the big, big, big, big, big, big touchdown" that gave the Cats a 20-17 win over North Texas. If only for a moment, you had to believe K-State was on its way to the Orange Bowl, and possibly the Super Bowl. Watching thousands of students attack the goal posts with the vengeance of serial killers made me feel that way.

Despite the 17-15 record that will be viewed in future years as sub-par at best, K-State basketball and the unexpected crossed familiar paths again. First, when talk of a fourth-straight postseason tournament appearance was weakening in tone, the Sooners showed up in Bramlage Coliseum to save the day.

While the game will be remembered for Skeeter Henry's spit wad that found its mark, it won't be overlooked that the 'Cat defense made Oklahoma look like a group of brick masons as K-State won, 66-51. A few weeks later, with the 'Cats licking wounds from three straight conference losses, they rehabilitated with a national television win over top-ranked Missouri. The 65-58 victory will go down as one of the biggest, sweetest and best that any Wildcat, in any lifetime, can ever

Even though the hardwood served some of the best times of the year, it also created the shocking and mysterious. Charles Dickens would have loved it. The resignations of women's coach Matilda Mossman and men's coach Lon Kruger left several K-Staters scratching their heads.

Mossman's farewell created questions because of its timing. Five games into the season, with a team picked as the preseason favorite to win the Big Eight, Mossman called it quits, citing personal reasons. Assistant Gaye Griffin was promoted as interim coach, and led K-State to the championship game of the conference tournament before losing to Oklahoma State.

When Kruger, the Sunflower State hero who returned to his alma mater, decided that greener pastures lay in Florida, Manhattan entered the Twilight Zone for a day. I'm sure of it. With the advantage of hindsight, it's apparent the Silver Lake native and his family are making a move that will provide many rewards,

Anatomy of the Water Treatment Plant

Manhattan's Water Treatment System

When the expansion of Manhattan's water purification system is completed this summer, it will increase the plant's capacity for making drinkable water from about 10 million gallons per day to about 16 million gallons per day. The expansion is almost identical to the existing treatment system in both its design and the way it functions.

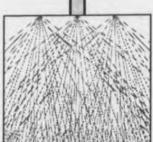

water Wells Manhattan's water is supplied by 16 different wells located in the area of the Manhattan Industrial Park. The number of wells pumping at any given time is determined by the amount of water needed by the city.

Kenneth Seematter, plant mechanic for the water treatment plant, checks the oil flow on the pump of one of the four new wells along the Kansas River.

Kristian Anderson, painter, adds the final coats of paint to the inside of a new filter basin. The new system will double the capacity of the plant.

Chlorine is one of several chemicals added to the water as it reaches the treatment building. Chlorine kills bacteria that is present in the water.

The treated water passes through three layers of different grades of sand and a layer of anthersite coal. The sand filters out impurities in the water.

ithin the next week, the City of Manhattan plans to start pumping water through its $4.2 million water treatment expansion project.

Expansion of the plant will double the amount of water the facility can process, allowing Manhattan to ease through the summer months with less worry of a major water shortage, said Alan Shineman, Manhattan superintendent of utilities.

Before the expansion, the city could treat and make drinkable about 10 million gallons of water per day — a problem when Manhattan sometimes uses as much as 14 million gallons per day during August.

Shineman said the project will be 98 percent complete by June 1. The system will go on-line and should be able to pump about 16 million gallons within the next few weeks.

Water for Manhattan is collected from 16 different wells located throughout the Manhattan Industrial Park and separated into three different well fields.

Although people may think city water comes from the Kansas River, it is actually groundwater. The oldest well field, located just across Tuttle Creek Boulevard from the water plant, has little influence from the river, Shineman said.

The other well fields are more influenced by the level of water in Tuttle Creek Reservoir and the Kansas River valley, he said. If the levels of the reservoir and river rise, the groundwater level under the wells also rises quickly.

The number of wells pumping is dependent on how much water the city is using, Shineman said.

If possible, he said, the city tries to run some wells in each field instead of pumping from just one field. When wells are pumping for an extended time, the water gets hard and requires more softening agents to make it drinkable.

During the summer, because of the high water demand, all 16 wells sometimes run for extended periods of time. The wells are checked periodically to make sure the pump motors are working properly and to spotcheck for other problems.

"Somebody that has worked here a while can tell if the pumps are okay just by listening to the motor," said Tad Ingalsbe, chief of plant operations at the water plant. "There's really not too much maintenance on the wells — just fill the pump motors with oil."

Water from the wells is pumped to the water treatment plant, where it goes through a flow-splitter that channels the water between the new treatment project and the old facility.

The two facilities are virtually identical, Shineman said. Besides the extra output, one advantage of having the new treatment reservoirs will be for maintenance reasons. One side will be able to be shut down for repairs while the other reservoirs supply water

Water is channeled into basins at the water plant, where lime and ferric sulfate is added to take impurities out of the water. These impurities, such as iron, are what makes the water "hard."

The lime and hardness is settled out of the water, and several chemicals are added. Chlorine is put in to kill bacteria, calgon stabilizes the water, and fluoride is added to help prevent tooth decay.

The water is then filtered through several layers of different grades of sand and a layer of coal, which is the final step in making the water drinkable.

Water flows into the city system. Depending on how much is being used, part of the water flows directly to households and businesses and part goes to water tanks.

The expansion project, paid for entirely out of water department revenue, was also built to allow for expansion and growth in Manhattan.

Shineman said another water tower and pump station will probably have to be installed in the near future on the far west side of town to allow for expansion.

Several wells will have to be redrilled within the next 10 years.

The water tower located near the Sunset Zoo is one of several high level water towers located across the city.

Design studio giving facelift to Seaton yard

By Julie Wakeman Collegian Reporter

The courtyard of Seaton Hall is getting a facelift from Fayez Husseini's environmental design

"It started out with one tree that my class decided to plant for Earth Day," Husseini said, "But one tree turned into three, and we started generating ideas and making plans until it became a big

The original intent of the renovations was to make the area look better and to control the flooding that occurs whenever it rains, Husseini said. The students decided to make the courtyard a memorial for 15 K-State environmental and architectural design students who have died while still in school.

Husseini said since the entire studio has participated, this project will be their final project for the semester.

"About 18 people have been working on this since last Friday," he said. "There has been someone here working for at least 12 to 15 hours each day."

Husseini said students from other studios are also helping with the project.

The entire project has been funded by the students.

The studio originally raised about $200 to purchase the trees, said Aaron Hoffmans, sophomore in environmental design. The students were going to use brick to lay the sidewalks because they could get it free. However, after obtaining more donations, flat rock was purchased.

'We got two sun dials that date back to the early 1900s for the memorials," Hoffmans said.

AIDS

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1 the fact that it's not strictly a gay disease and that anyone can contract the disease. We talk about high-risk behaviors, which I think helps bring other issues to the forefront, such as drug use and stuff like that, that parents need to talk about with their children.

"But when the conversation ends is when we talk about Dad dying," Buckley said. "Children don't want to talk about Dad dying. They suddenly change the subject or get quiet and there will be a pause, and they'll go off playing. I'll try talking to them on my own, and we'll always reach that point."

Buckley said when he was 18 his stepfather died of cancer. He said his stepfather never talked about his cancer or the death process or what he was feeling when he was afraid.

'We weren't able to talk about what we were feeling and have our questions answered for us, and I don't want that to be the case for my children or my parents or anyone else that's involved with me," Buckley said. "I want an openness and an honesty so that when I'm gone there aren't any questions."

Buckley's chronicle of experiences with the virus is not a happy one. He ignored it, he drank to forget it, and he got mad at the world. Nothing worked.

He said the toughest fight has not been against the disease. It has been against the thoughts of dying in the so-called prime of life.

"When somebody else dies, you lose one person, but when you're the person who's dying, you lose every-body at once," Buckley said. "And it's not just people. You lose your job, you lose your mental faculties, you lose your physical capabilities. It's a disease of losses, and it strikes in the prime of your life."

Buckley is involved with the Riley-Geary County chapter of the Topeka AIDS Project, he said. The organization helps victims of AIDS and their families cope with the

"We have a lot of patients that I work with and I'm associated with who have pneumonia or have lost a tremendous amount of weight or have started developing AIDS dementia. It's hard to watch those people die because some of those things I know are going to happen to me somewhere down the line," Buckley

Buckley has had two close friends and six other acquaintances die from the disease. All were from this area.

"When I hear of another person contracting AIDS I try to jump in and save them, and that gets me into emotional trouble," he said. "The only way I can cope with that is to throw myself into a little denial and not relate it to myself. I treat them as if neither one of us were ill.

"I'm overwhelmed, at times, with what's going on around me. Sometimes I get really burned out. Every time there's a death or I find out that another person is infected, it really knocks me down emotionally. And there are times when I just want to run away and hide from it all."

Sometimes running does not help.

In April, he left the state to visit his mother, and on the first day there he received a call from a patient. Buckley spent his first two days on the phone with the patient and his family doing crisis intervention.

"I was thinking 'My God, I've traveled 750 miles, and I can't get away from it," he said.

Buckley said it's not easy to make the best possible use of every single moment. He's coping the best he can, but he's not sure what to do with the rest of his life.

'Quality of life is much more important to me than quantity of life," he said. "Making the right decisions and making the best use of the time I have left is the most important thing for me to do. But trying to make those decisions is difficult.

'You learn that what is important in life is - rather than letting every day-to-day annoyance get to you you learn to really embellish a lot of relationships and share a lot of love and give a lot of love. In that respect, having this disease can be a positive.

ally has no idea how much longer he all the time in the world."

"It varies from person to person, and it depends upon the opportunistic infection that you get," Buckley said.

He said through medical technology, the disease is becoming more manageable.

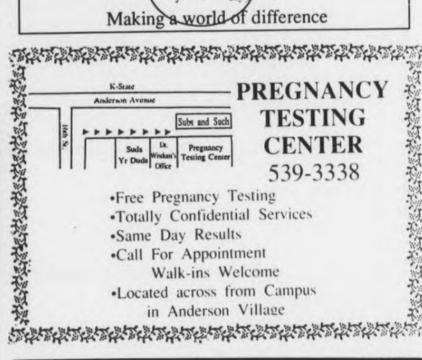

"They're finding now that you can live eight to 10 years with ARC before developing full-blown AIDS. With medication, the quantity and the quality of our lives are being extended and improved. It's not curable," he said, and laughed rather uneasily. "But more manageable."

Buckley doesn't believe a cure is in sight. As emotionally devastating as living with AIDS has been for him, he has come to try to accept it and find an inner peace.

Once you come to acceptance, I think you have the ability to turn it around and see it as a positive thing," Buckley said. "You take care of yourself as well as you can and do all the things the doctor says, etc., etc. But then you've got the opportunity to make some life decisions.

A recently-formed nurses union at the University of Kansas Medical Center was approved by the Legislature last week. The negotiating party is called Kansas University Nurses Association.

Phoebe Samelson, arts and sciences instructor, said the union will not affect the educational aspect of the medical center unless money it has requested isn't allocated. If this happens, it's possible some of the educational units could be closed.

Jackie McClain, personnel director at KU medical center, said right now the negotiations are in a five-day waiting period in which any opposition can challenge the decision. McClain said the administration will not challenge the union.

"The administration felt there were ways for the nurses to better represent themselves than to unionize," McClain said. "We felt there were better ways of raising

She said the administration doesn't really know what the nurses want because they didn't raise any specific issues during the campaign.

"We're looking forward to working with the nurses," McC-lain said. "We won't challenge them during the five-day waiting

The nurses are seeking higher wages because of compression, meaning that wages remain relatively the same even after 10 or 15 years. Promotions are also infrequent, Samelson said. In a union, the wages won't be under civil service wage constraints, and nurses will have more of a chance to advance.

Samelson said if the wages at the KU Medical Center are smaller than the wages at the hospital nearby, there is a greater chance of nurses leaving, causing a severe shortage.

Students learn to inseminate

Internship class offers artificial breeding experience at Kansas cattle ranches

By Anne Krauss Collegian Reporter

Spending the weekend with an arm up the back end of a cow is nothing unusual for students enrolled in an artificial insemination internship class offered by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry.

Students learn how to artificially inseminate cattle and then travel to ranches in Kansas to gain experience breeding cattle.

"It helps to improve the cow-calf internship by giving students the chance to work closely with producers who are making management decisions," said Larry Corah, professor in animal sciences and industry.

Corah said the program also bene-fits producers by helping them develop an artificial insemination program and provides the University with a means of collecting research data.

Each class has eight to 10 students who have had some experience with producer whose cattle they are the process. Most have some background in working with livestock. "Students receive additional training in February and March and then inseminate cattle during April and May," Corah said. He said the program receives a lot of support from producers.

"Often producers really want to use an artificial insemination program, but don't have the time or training to do it," he said. "We can roll out a crew and get it done for them."

Corah said he visits the site before the students and administers a shot of prostaglandin to the cows. By giving the hormone to the entire group of cattle at once, most should be in heat and ready to breed when the students arrive.

"I go out and set up on Wednesday, and they go out on the following weekend," he said. "They operate on their own and are responsible to the breeding."

Rob McCoy, senior in animal sciences and industry, said the first thing students do at the site is determine which cows are in heat.

"We follow the 'a.m.-p.m.' rule," McCoy said. "If they seem to be in heat in the morning, we breed them that night. If they're in heat at night, we wait until the next morning."

Corah said the process was very natural and didn't place the cow under any duress if done quietly and

"When you artificially inseminate a cow you take a straw of frozen semen, thaw it out and put it into an application gun," Corah said. "You insert that into the vaginal region of a heifer, pass it through the cervix and deposit the semen."

Corah said students must have their arm and hand in good shape before going out to breed cattle.

"You don't go out and run a 400-meter dash without prior training," he said. "If you're going to breed 40 or 50 cattle per day, you have to make sure your arm is in good shape."

Students travel to the locations of cooperating producers throughout April and May to breed cattle.

"Artificial insemination is really important in the cattle industry," McCoy said. "It's a valuable thing to Deering said one solution to the research-teaching dilemma could be to allow faculty to do more of what they enjoy doing.

"There should be differentiated staffing," she said. "If we used a collaborative model, people who do well at research won't have to dilute their strength and those who enjoy teaching can help provide data for research.'

Coffman said this is one area that will be explored next year by a task force made up of faculty, administration, graduate students and undergraduate students.

"A key element is establishing faculty expectations based on an individual basis rather than a university norm," he said. "In doing so, you can capitalize on strengths and minimize Brian Krannawitter, sophomore in finance and intramural chairman of Sigma Phi Epsilon, said the Sig Eps are involved in every event that counts towards points to the house but they usually have at least one person in every event even if there are no points awarded.

"With the variety of sports the intramural program offers, everyone will have a chance to be in the sport they are best at," Krannawitter said.

but it created a unity among fraternity members.

'I was orientated in the fall of '88," he said. "I had a uniform and had to run while on campus, no matter where. We had mandatory study hours. During hell week, we wore combat boots. We all had to go through it together and it created a tight knit."

Mayfield said his fraternity is based on the ideals of brotherhood, scholarship, and service. Active members look for certain qualities in new members, and through a stressful orientation, they were able to de-velop the qualities the active members wanted to see.

"We want members to have pride and brotherhood," he said. "We want them to be themselves but to do what is best for the whole."

Mayfield said the new rule might create some resentment among the old and new members. He said the fratemity also is concerned about receiving and developing quality members.

Paske

Only those close to Mossman and Kruger, and the gods and goddesses of Purple Pride, will ever know why. But life goes on, and new coaches Susan Yow and Dana Altman will undoubtedly do their best to make sure of it.

The renewed optimism that Yow and Altman bring to their jobs is as exciting as many of the other events of 1989-90, which often get overlooked. Track coach John Capriotti already has several NCAA championship qualifiers, continuing on the strong tradition he has helped build. Coach Mike Clark's baseball team flew out of the gate in the Big Eight race, and still has a chance to grab a long-awaited title with a series sweep at Oklahoma State.

To mention all of the strides that the programs at K-State have made during the year, whether individually or as a team, would take more space than this page allows. But from the record crowd of 6,155 at the K-State-Wichita State baseball game, to the 85-57 whipping the Kansas Jayhawks delivered to the 'Cats in Bramlage on that cold January evening, it's been a year full of ups, downs, ins, outs, twists and turns.

Wefald agreed all of the schools will be negatively affected.

"But K-State's financial situation has been severely compounded by three years of significant enrollment growth without adequate growth-related funding," he said. "The consequences for Kansas State are devastating."

Wefald said K-State is in a worse competitive position relative to its peers than before the Margin of Excellence was initiated.

Beijing protests mark anniversary

By The Associated Press

BEIJING - A small group of students at Beijing University hurled bottles and bricks from dormitory balconies at security forces Sunday night, the anniversary of the crackdown on the democracy movement, witnesses said.

It was the strongest protest yet to mark the one-year anniversary of the army attack on the pro-democracy demonstrators in Beijing, in which hundreds and possibly thousands of students and other unarmed civilians

Foreign witnesses said the security forces, which were on patrol, moved away from under the balconies after the students began their attack, but the students continued to hurl objects and abuse at them.

It was the first outbreak all day on Beijing's campuses, where many students said they were too afraid to commemorate the anniversary.

That was not the case in Hong Kong, where tens of thousands of Chinese demonstrated. "We won't forget June 4" and "We are not scared," said the banners of marchers in Hong Kong, which reverts to Chinese rule in 1997. Police said 100,000 people joined the march; organizers said more than 200,000 did.

Much smaller demonstrations were held in Taiwan and Japan.

In Beijing, convoys of police jeeps and motorcycles drove through the university district all evening, their red lights flashing, in a show of strength. At least one convoy included an open-bed truck filled with civilian militia wearing yellow hardhats.

Roadblocks went up around the city after dark, and police stopped drivers and checked identification. The police presence was especially heavy around the residential compounds for foreigners.

Earlier Sunday, three Chinese made small, public protests on the edges of Tiananmen Square, where last year's student-led protesters made their headquarters.

One man approached a foreign television crew and tried to display a protest poster. Police immediately dragged him away, as he shouted to bystanders in Chinese, "Rise up."

Hours later, someone threw white paper money - a traditional offering to the dead - from a car as it drove past the square. Police immediately tried to shoo away bystanders and pick up the paper.

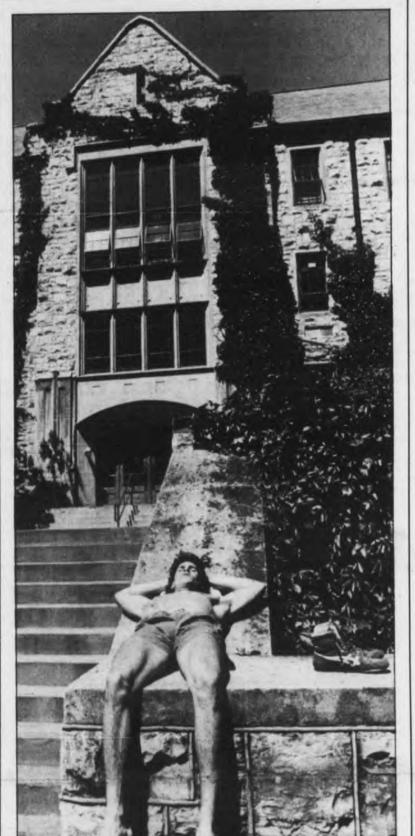

Police also took into custody a young woman who stuffed an 18-page essay into the pocket of a West Germany ZDF television reporter, Gisela Mahlmann.

Mahlmann said the handwritten essay was difficult to read but appeared to be related to last year's military crackdown.

The small protests came despite the heaviest security in Beijing since martial law was lifted in January.

Thousands of police and soldiers were stationed throughout the city to discourage commemoration of the crackdown. Tiananmen Square, the symbolic heart of Beijing, was closed to the public and encircled by paramilitary police.

"There will be small private gatherings," said a Chinese office worker in his 30s who stood near the square. "All we can do now is think. The memories are in our minds."

Threats by rebels affect training

By The Associated Press

MANILA, Philippines - Recent murders of American soldiers by Communist rebels and new threats have prompted the U.S. Air Force to scale back a training exercise to keep all personnel on base, U.S. sources said Sunday.

Air Force officials said about 1,000 troops had been expected to take part in the two-week exercise that was to begin Monday at Clark Air Base.

But the number was reduced to about 850 so that all personnel could be housed on the base, 50 miles north of Manila.

In Honolulu, Air Force spokesman Maj. James Pasierb said the reduction would not affect the scope of the operation, the final phase of this year's Cope Thunder series of exercises.

He claimed the reductions were not prompted by Communist threats. "I want to make it clear that we are not scaling back on the exercise because of any terroristic activity," Pasierb said. But sources at Clark, speaking on condition of anonymity, said security was the primary consideration. Last month, Communist rebels killed two American airmen near Clark and vowed more attacks until all U.S.

troops leave the Philippines. AU.S. Navy lieutenant was fatally stabbed Saturday near Subic, but officials said the motive was robbery and not politically related. The Navy identified the victim as Richard E. Brown, 33, of Spring Valley, N.Y.

On Friday, U.S. officials imposed new travel restrictions on the 20,300 troops, Defense Department civilians and military dependents stationed at Clark, citing the current threat conditions.

Clark Air Base is in an area of central Luzon island, a stronghold of the New People's Army, which has been waging a 21-year insurgency to establish a Marxist state.

Students live in fear

Military follows Chinese actions

By Chris Koger Managing Editor

Editor's note: The Chinese students in this story have not been identified to protect friends and family members still living in the People's Republic of China.

One year ago, a movement towards democracy in China was halted when government troops killed hundreds, perhaps thousands, of protesters - many of whom were students. Sunday and today, similar demonstrations were and are being held to commemorate their deaths.

But according to several Chinese students attending K-State, no such demonstrations are planned on campus. Students say they do not want to attract the attention of Chinese government officials who may be monitoring their activities in Manhattan.

"The Chinese government has launched a campaign against students who express feelings against (the government)," one student said. 'Most of the Chinese students here have families there, and they have to protect them. The persecution still continues.'

Although there will be no demonstration, a private meeting is planned to give the students a chance to talk about the changes in China and how they feel about them.

'We certainly want to express our feelings, but are afraid to," the stu-

The posters feature the picture of a lone protester who faced the column of army tanks, and a white paper flower in memory of those who died in the protests.

$75,000 to Essential Edge Wefald donates

By Margaret Clarkin Staff Reporter

Fund raising at K-State received a boost from the top last month with a donation from the president of the University.

President Jon Wefald pledged to donate $75,000 to the Essential Edge Campaign, a $100 fund-raising campaign by the KSU Foundation to enhance the needs of the University. Funds raised through the campaign will benefit the eight academic colleges, University libraries, intercollegiate athletics and a new art museum.

The donation, which includes $25,000 in cash, is designated to the University libraries, the Department of History and a new art museum. The remaining $50,000 will be a planned gift to go to the same three

A variety of reasons prompted Wefald to donate the gift to those specific areas.

"Everyone would agree that the library is of vital importance to the future of K-State," Wefald said.

Wefald said he and his wife, Ruth Ann, have long supported the need for a new art museum at K-State, and he said he felt that was an area of the fund-raising project that needed the granted salary increases to the heads of the three largest schools: K-State, the University of Kansas and Wichita State University. Rather than accept the raise in salary, Wefald decided to donate his pay increase for 1990-91 to the Foundation.

The raise would have been $2,300 and will go to the English department as a one-year gift.

Robert Krause, vice president of institutional advancement; Tom Rawson, vice president of admi-

The Kansas Board of Regents has nistration and finance; and Provost James Coffman will also donate their salary increases to the University, Wefald said.

Worries about budget cuts led the four to forego the pay increases. "It's been a rough year for K-State," Rawson said. "It's a small thing I can do to help out the (University) needs." Rawson said his donation will go to the College of Education. A graduate of the college, Rawson has given small contributions before, he said.

"It's symbolic that the three vice presidents made the same decision," Wefald said.

"We didn't do well in the Legislature, and this is our way of doing everything we can to help," he said.

Gary Hellebust, vice president for major gifts to the Foundation, said the donation of salary increases means a great deal to the University.

"It sets precedent to staff and faculty," he said.

Regents approve tuition increases

By Gregory A. Branson

A tuition increase of $18 for instate students and $218 for out-ofstate students for the 1990-1991 school year was approved by the Board of Regents at its May 17 meeting.

Regent Robert Creighton, chairman of the Special Committee on Tuition and Fees, said the increase is a continuation of what the board has done in the past few years of having the students pay more of the cost of education.

He defended the large rise in non-resident tuition as still being less than the cost of out-of-state tuition at many peer universities.

Regent Charles Hostetler said at the April regents meeting, "A student in Illinois can go to K-State for approximately the same price they can go to a school in Illinois.'

One reason the tuition increases are less than in previous years is because the Legislature did not fund the third-year portion of the Margin of Excellence program. In past years, tuition increases have exceeded the Higher Education Price Index to help fund MOE.

MOE is a program designed to make faculty salaries at regents institutions more competitive with their peers in an attempt to attract and retain quality educators.

It was to be jointly funded by legislative appropriations and tuition, but because of the state budget cuts this year, the Legislature did not appropriate the needed funds.

The Student Advisory Committee to the board recommended no tuition increase at all because of the lack of funding for MOE and because students have had large increases the past several Creighton said concern from students and parents that tuition costs have risen too rapidly in recent years was another reason the committee recommended a smaller than usual increase.

South Africa may end restrictions

End to state of emergency aimed to coincide with Mandela tour

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa Major newspapers predicted Sunday that the 4-year-old national state of emergency will be lifted next weekend almost everywhere but in Natal province, which has been plagued by factional fighting.

The papers said the announcement will be timed to coincide with a 13-nation tour by African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela, who will visit Europe, Africa, the United States and Canada starting Monday.

Revocation of the state of emergency has been a key demand of the ANC before it agrees to formal negotiations with de Klerk on a constitution that would set up blackwhite power sharing.

The ANC has said foreign governments should not lift economic sanctions against South Africa until the emergency laws are lifted, and Mandela is expected to ask that sanctions remain for now.

The state of emergency was imposed on June 12, 1986, by former President P.W. Botha to quell nationwide anti-government protests and political violence that killed more than 2,000 people, most of them

But since he came to power last August, President F.W. de Klerk has nullified some provisions of the emergency decrees and says he intends to dismantle apartheid.

He has permitted anti-government protests, legalized the ANC and other banned groups, freed scores of people detained without charge and lifted most restrictions on news coverage.

During a trip to Europe earlier this month, de Klerk said he would review the remaining emergency provisions when they come up for renewal on June 11.

They restrict reporting about unrest, some forms of protest and a broad range of statements the government considers subversive.

On Sunday, four national newspapers representing a range of political viewpoints said the state of emergency would be almost completely lifted.

"Most state of emergency measures will be scrapped within the next few days," wrote the antigovernment English language Sunday Star. The middle-of-the-road Sunday Tribune said: "Parts of the emergency are likely to remain in force, however, particularly in troubled areas such as Natal." The Afrikaans-language and generally pro-government Rapport, and City Press, the largest circulation newspaper for blacks, carried the same news.

"The timing of the announcement on the emergency will complicate Mr. Mandela's position overseas," the Sunday Tribune said.

Mandela's will include stops in Britain, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Botswana, Ethiopia, Uganda, Kenya and Mozambique.

Since de Klerk legalized black political groups and freed Mandela and other prisoners, there has been a surge in violence.

Supporters of rival black groups have battled one another in townships nationwide, leaving more than 500 people dead this year. There has also been an increase in shootings by police, who have fired on marchers or defended themselves from attacks by crowds in townships.

Most of the violence has occurred in Natal, where the emergency laws have not stopped supporters of the ANC and the Inkatha organization from fighting each other. In recent years more than 5,000 people have died in the province.

Mandela has asked the government to use soldiers and police to stop the factional fighting, and some observers said he agreed troops should be left in Natal while emergency restrictions were lifted elsewhere.

Algerian flood kills 24 miners

ALGIERS, Algeria (AP) - Miners broke open an underground spring and it flooded their zinc and lead mine, killing at least 24 workers 1,000 feet below the surface, authorities reported Sunday.

The accident occurred Saturday night at the Ain Azel mine in eastern Algeria, the government-owned National Enterprise for Non-Ferrous Products reported.

At least 24 miners and possibly more died when the waters rushed through the underground caverns. Three people were quickly rescued, but authorities said they held little hope of finding other survivors.

France bus crash kills 11

AUXERRE, France (AP) - A British doubledecker tourist bus taking vacationers home from Spanish beaches flipped over Sunday on a French highway, killing 11 people and injuring 61, police said.

The bus burst a tire on the main north-south highway, swerved into a ditch, tumbled onto its side and slid more than 100 yards before coming to rest in a wheat field.

Police said many of those who died were hurled from the vehicle. A trail of suitcases, handbags and personal belongings littered the roadside. "Several bodies were trapped under the bus," said an off-duty police officer who witnessed the accident. "We saw them through the windows but couldn't do anything." At least 22 people were reported in serious condition; 39 suffered minor injuries. Helicopters and ambulances carried them to hospitals in Auxerre, 100 miles south of Paris, and nearby Sens, Joigny and Montargis.

The British Foreign Office said the bus was carrying 69 passengers, six guides and the driver.

The tourists were returning from holiday resorts along Spain's Mediterranean coast, said British Consul-General James Daly. French officials said the bus was bound for Birmingham.

Anti-logging protest launched

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) - Leftist activists of all stripes, spurred by a bombing that injured two environmentalists, are preparing for a widespread anti-logging protest campaign they're calling Redwood Summer.

Earth First! organizers said they hope to reproduce the environmental equivalent of Freedom Summer, the 1964 voter registration campaign centered in Mississippi that helped lead to the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

Though Redwood Summer protests are planned as peaceful civil disobedience to slow the pace of logging and save oldgrowth redwoods, a number of violent incidents already have occurred because of tension between those who make their living from the northern California timber industry and environmentalists.

During demonstrations, a protester had her nose broken by a logger and another protester was dropped by a punch from another logger. To that extent, Redwood Summer resembles Freedom Summer, which was marked by violence, including the murder of three civil rights workers near Philadelphia, Miss.

Redwood Summer is the kind of event "that could galvanize national and even international opinion to stop the destruction of old-growth temperate rain forests," Foreman said. "Just like Mississippi Summer that finally turned public opinion around and brought about the passage of the Civil Rights Act."

"We've had a multitude of groups step forward," Pam Davis, an Earth First! organizer, told a cheering audience last month at an anti-logging rally in Santa Rosa.

They said the recruits include Greenpeace; the Christic Institute, which claims a secret government undertakes illegal operations such as the Iran-Contra affair; Industrial Workers of the World; Rainforest Action Network; Pledge of Resistance, which opposes U.S. policy in Central America; and United Student Action, which calls itself the nation's largest progressive student

Court erases stay of execution

CARSON CITY, Nev. (AP) - Thomas Baal was put to death by injection Sunday after sending a greeting to his parents who tried to block the execution he said he wanted.

Baal, 26, was pronounced dead at 9:14 a.m., nine minutes after a mixture of three lethal drugs was pumped through tubes into his arms as he lay strapped on a table in the former gas chamber at the Nevada State Prison.

The execution came 10 hours after the U.S. Supreme Court voted 5-4 to erase a federal appeals court ruling blocking the execution.

The high court threw out a stay granted Saturday by the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco at the request of Edwin and Doris Baal of Mesa, Colo., over their son's objections.

ROCKY MOUNT, Mo. (AP) - Electric wiring that touched a dock ladder electrocuted a swimmer Sunday at Lake of the Ozarks, the Missouri State Water Patrol said.

Thomas Storm, 22, of Westwood, Kan., died at 11:30 a.m. when he grabbed the ladder and sank, the patrol said. A neighbor pulled Storm from 15 feet of water and witnesses unsuccessfully tried to resuscitate him. The accident occurred at a private dock on the Lick Branch cove near Rocky Mount.

Moss pleads no contest to charges

By Tomari Quinn Campus/City Editor

A suspect has entered the plea of no contest in the beating death of a K-State student.

The body of Shane D. Harrison, a freshman in engineering, was found in the alley behind 816 N. Juliette a little after 8 a.m. Feb. 20. John L. Moss was arrested and charged with second-degree murder and theft later County Coroner Rick Kaldor said Harrison was beaten severely, especially around and on the head. No weapon was believed to be involved in the death.

Riley County Police Capt. Allen Raynor said district court officers are checking into Moss' background by thoroughly examining his records and talking with his family and friends. The officers will then give a recommendation to the judge before Sentencing will occur at 10:30 a.m. July 2.

By Tim Clopton Collegian Reporter

The findings of a 1986 study involving a University professor played a role in the federal government's loss in a court case involving Agent Orange.

Robert Robel, professor of biology, was one of seven researchers involved in the study on the relations of chemicals in herbicides and cancer.

The study was directed at farm herbicides, not Agent Orange, Robel "Our study was in no way related to the research on Agent Orange," he said. "We looked at the same chemicals that were used during Vietnam, including the chemical 2,4-D, which was used in Agent Orange. "When you get into court, the lawyers will bring in any evidence they can to support their side of the issue, and I would presume that (the study) could support the plaintiff's case that Agent Orange increased the incidence of cancer," he said.

According to the study, farmers who were exposed to phenoxy herbicides, especially 2,4-D, had high rates of acquiring non-Hodgkin's lymphomas, a form of cancer. 2,4-D was also a chemical in Agent Orange that is believed to increase the incidence of cancer.

The research team was prompted by the National Cancer Institute to do the study on herbicides in Kansas to see if they could replicate studies done in Sweden.

The Swedish studies showed certain herbicides caused non-Hodgkin's lymphomas, Hodgkin's disease and soft-tissue sarcoma.

"We found that herbicide applications increase the incidence of one of the cancers, non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, and it did not increase the incidences of soft-tissue sarcoma or Hodgkin's disease," Robel said. 'The Swedish study seemed to have been flawed by bias. They were looking to prove that herbicides cause cancer, and, therefore, if you are looking for that, you can easily find

Robel said steps were taken to avoid bias in the study he worked on. "Our study was not flawed in that way," he said. "In fact, it was done almost secretly in the state, so people did not know what was going on, so we did not have an emotional influence."

A study on Agent Orange, which followed the herbicide study, showed it was made up of several contaminants that are not found in herbicides used in the Midwest,

Atmosphere of 'trust' marks close of summit

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - President George Bush and Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev proclaimed "an atmosphere of growing trust" Sunday at the close of their four-day summit. They left unsolved nagging differences on German unity and independence for Lithuania.

The leaders parted with smiles and warm handshakes and a decision to meet on a regular basis - perhaps annually. The Soviet president invited Bush to Moscow, a state visit that may take place before year's end.

The Soviet president and his wife, Raisa, jetted off to meet with business and farm leaders in Minneapolis and an overnight stop in San Francisco. On Monday, Gorbachev has a reunion with Ronald Reagan and holds a first-ever meeting with the president of South Korea.

"We've moved a long, long way from the depths of the Cold War," Bush said at a wrapup news conference, sitting alongside Gorbachev at the same mahogany table where they sealed agreements Friday to slash long-range nuclear weapons, halt production of chemical weapons and lift trade barriers against Moscow.

The news conference was broadcast live in America and across the Soviet Union, where mounting political and economic problems await Gorbachev on his return.

Gorbachev said the two leaders compared differences in "an atmosphere of frankness, a constructive atmosphere, an atmosphere of growing trust."

Barbara Bush and Raisa Gorbachev, who cemented a warm relationship over the four days, sat beside each other at the news conference, listening with earphones to the translations of their husband's comments.

Despite the rosy assessments, stubborn problems persisted.

Bush said Gorbachev offered no assurances that he would ease his economic stranglehold on Lithuania, the Baltic republic struggling for freedom. The U.S. leader said the question of Baltic independence was "one of the thorns in the side of an overall relationship.'

As for Gorbachev's objections to a united Germany belonging to NATO, Bush said, "I'm not sure we narrowed them." Gorbachev said the European questions were matters of "the highest level of strategy." He said of Germany, without elaboration, "We're not going to put spokes in the wheel."

Separately, Secretary of State James A. Baker III said he will explore a "political agreement" be-tween NATO and the Soviet-led Warsaw Pact to bridge the differences over a unified Germany. He was skeptical of an idea from a Gorbachev adviser that the Soviet Union become a member of NATO, the 16-nation Western alliance.

Overseas, leaders of the two Germanys said the summit improved prospects for unifying their countries and boosted chances for disarmament.

West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher pronounced the meeting "a great success." East German Prime Minister Lothar de Maiziere hailed "new and very different ideas" about stabilizing European security.

Baker and Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze will take up the German question on Tuesday at a Copenhagen human rights meeting and then again later in the month at the so-called two-plus-four unification talks. These talks involve the two Germanys and the four victors of

Extension agent dies Pretzer developed economic programs

By David Frese Staff Reporter

KSU Extension agent Don D. Pretzer died Wednesday.

Pretzer suffered an apparent heart attack. He was transported by ambulance to the Saint Mary Hospital and died while being air-lifted to Stormont-Vail Medical Center in Topeka. He was 58.

Pretzer was an assistant director for agriculture and natural resources programs at the University for the Kansas Cooperative Extension Service, a position he had held since June 1987. He had previously served as an extension farm management economist for 16 years.

In the field of agricultural economics, Pretzer proved instrumental in the development and implementation of extension agricultural programs. In 1971, while serving as an extension farm management economist, Pretzer began a heavily relied-upon series of leasing publications that were used to assist in establishing crop shares and cash rental rates for different land types.

Pretzer began his involvement with the extension service in 1958. After earning his animal science degree at K-State, Pretzer became an assistant agriculture agent-intraining for Montgomery County. Later, he served as an extension agent in both Rice and Linn counties.

During the late 1960's, while working on a master's degree at K-State, Pretzer acted as an economist in grain marketing for the extension. He received his doctorate in agricultural economics from the University of Missouri in 1971 and then returned to K-State as an extension farm management economist.

Pretzer was born Jan. 20, 1932, in Elmdale, and graduated from Garnett High School in 1950. He served as a pilot in the Air Force from 1955-58 and as a reserve captain until 1969.

He is survived by his wife of 14 years, Barbara. Other survivors include five children: Janis, Annette, Denise, Mark and Lana.

A scholarship has been established in Pretzer's name and will assist agriculture students in Anderson County, where he graduated high school.

Facing poverty humbling experience

stood face to face with poverty and I turned and ran away from it as fast as I could. For the first time, I saw actual Third World conditions. Standing in the middle of a colonia, a squatters' settlement, outside of the Mexican city of Reynosa, I was confronted with the sort of poverty most Americans only see on TV with an 800 number underneath it and a Sally Struthers voice-over asking for donations. I was less than five miles south of the U.S.-Mexico border.

This particular colonia was centered around a landfill. Trash trucks drove by regularly to dump the waste of urban consumers. The houses were made of corrugated tin, wood, cinder blocks and Most of them appeared only large enough to contain one room. Some had floors, doors and windows. Most did not. Some of the residents had put up fences around their 10-foot square lots. Some had gardens, some had clotheslines. There wasn't any grass or trees, just miles and miles of tiny houses, trash and blowing burnt sienna-colored

The colonia was one stop on a tour arranged by the Rio Grande Defense Committee. The idea behind the tour is for people to witness life along the border with visits to detention centers for Central American refugees; the Rio Grande to watch people wade across to the United States; and Mexican border cities like Reynosa, where U.S.-owned companies employ workers for about $5-$7 per six-day work week in assembly plants.

According to a social worker at the Center for Investigations and Migratory Studies, the plants, called maquiladoras, usually employ women because they are willing to work for low wages and sit for hours doing tasks that require fine motor coordination such as soldering

In order to fight its economic prob-lems, the Mexican government offered foreign corporations incentives to open up plants in Mexico.

The workers assemble parts to be ta-ken back across to the United States to be put together as finished products, such as TV sets or motors. At the border, the parts are taxed at a much lower duty than the finished goods would be. In addition, the Mexican government has fewer restrictions against pollution and the use of hazardous chemicals.

The social worker said the workers are regularly exposed to PCBs, acetone and other hazardous substances and are not given any protective gear. As the economy fluctuates, the workers are hired or laid off. The companies are generally not required to offer any benefits or compensation to the employees. The average length of time a maquila worker is employed at a job is two

But the maquiladoras offer a source of income to impoverished Mexicans who often migrate from the interior of the country to the border cities looking for work. According to the social worker, they end up living in the colonias near the maquiladora industrial

The colonia we visited one afternoon

From the highway, we followed a dirt road for about two miles until we reached the colonia. We drove along one of the access roads into the center. From inside the station wagon, I could see the houses and a few of the men, women, children, dogs and chickens who lived there. The various sizes of clothing flapping on the lines outside some of the houses indicated who lived inside. I could handle this. It was like driving through one of those safari adventure parks in Southern California where the baboons, water buffalo and ostriches roam for the pleasure of suburban families on vacation, but without signs instructing us to stay on the roads and keep hands and arms inside the car at all times. I could still maintain some sort of detachment from what I was seeing. I could pretend it wasn't real.

Soon the car stopped, and it was time to get out and look around. Only one other person in the group besides the tour coordinator spoke any Spanish.

I stuck with the tour coordinator, Cathy, figuring she had done this before and knew the proper etiquette for asking people how they came to live in this sort of hell.

athy walked up to a middleaged woman who was walking along the road. She started asking about her life, why she came to Reynosa.

The women said she was from Victoria, a city south of Reynosa. She had lived in this colonia for five years. She was a widow and had five children. Her oldest child is 17. All of her children were going to school. She came here to work in the maquiladoras. She had recently been laid off. The plant was now hiring workers again, but they told her they were looking for people with more education than she had. She said she had gotten the same response at several other plants.

One of the people in our group, a Scottish nun, asked how this woman and her family were surviving. "They're not," Cathy replied without even asking the woman.

The woman also talked about the conditions in the colonia. She said it wasn't a unified neighborhood. At this end, the people who scavenged through the trash looking for scraps to sell controlled things. They had built a small chapel for a local priest to hold mass on Sunday. They were opposed to other residents' efforts to clean up the area and perhaps get the landfill closed.

She said the only water pump was over the next hill. The city had recently come out and looked at the possibilty of putting in another water pump. Surveyors had painted white lines along the road indicating where the pipes should be laid.

Listening to this conversation, I was struck by how optimistic this woman was. I thought about the ability of the human spirit to endure horrible conditions. But the overriding thought in my mind was "Thank God this isn't me living here in a one-room shack with a dirt floor, no running water and a view of a landfill." By some great coincidence of the universe, I was born in the United States and got to live a life where things like adequate food, shelter and clothing were never an issue.

Next came the feeling of guilt, which naturally follows these selfish thoughts. 'How could I think about myself in the midst of those less fortunate?" I asked myself. "What can I do to help the people living in conditions like these?"

More than two weeks after the visit to colonia, I can't reconcile my selfish thoughts with the guilt. I don't have an answer to why people live in poverty in the contemporary world.

I was scared by what I saw in the colonia because I realized how close I live to people who are suffering. I can't get the image of the people, tiny houses, trash and blowing brown dust out of my mind. What I saw in Mexico changed the way I look at the world. I've always known there was more out there than what I had been exposed to in my relatively sheltered environment. But my first steps out into the world were the most horrifying and the most calling for democratic reforms. Daily protests, including marches in Beijing and Shanghai, were covered by international media, who were initially in the country to cover the visit in May by Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev. The world watched as the peaceful movement grew from a few university students to thousands of Chinese people.

Despite the efforts of the Chinese government to shut down media coverage, the world also watched as 20,000 troops swept into the square, killing about 2,000 people. A nationwide crackdown followed, and hundreds more were arrested and imprisoned or executed.

This summer the future of art in our country will be determined by Congress when it votes on whether or not to fund the National Endowment for the Arts.

The NEA is under scrutiny for giving grants to exhibits that were judged "obscene" by a group of conservative, closed-minded Americans. These people want to control what art is created and stamp out our freedom of expression.

Isn't that also known as censorship? Are we going to allow this to happen? Letting our elected officials determine what taste we have in art is not good democracy.

The people who want to cut NEA funding don't seem to understand the real purpose for the endowment. Created in 1965 by then-President Lyndon B. Johnson, the endowment gives grants to such things as arts education in schools, museums, public television and an Arts Design Program, which helps create more modern and safer cities.

In 1965, the full extent of our nation's professional arts that could receive NEA money was one chorus, 60 orchestras, 37 dance companies and 56 nonprofit theatres. In 1990, there are now 57 choruses, 210 orchestras, 250 dance companies and 400 theatres that all operate on endowment grants.

Here on campus, the NEA plays a part in the McCain Auditorium events that occur throughout the year. According to Richard Martin, McCain director, 50 percent of the grants given to the Kansas Arts Commission are from the NEA. The commission in turn is a principle supporter of the McCain series.

How much does the endowment cost you, the taxpayer? Sixty-four cents per year.

That's it. In fact, the total funding of the NEA is less than the cost of one B2 bomber. As a nation, we rank among the lowest in the world of support given to the arts. Some nations in fact give more money to individual exhibits than the total NEA funding.

The NEA does so much and costs less than a cheeseburger, so why cut it? Some politicians say it's to preserve moral America. Preserving them from what - the decision to choose for themselves?

The solution is simple. Write your representatives. Let them know what you think with a postcard saying, "I support refunding of the National Endowment for the Arts without restrictive language." That is sufficient enough to get the message across. Even if you are not in favor of all the art you see, remember that the Endowment supports so much that its loss would devastate our cultural

Thanks for help

Because no one should be hungry - we write to say both "Thank you" and "Godspeed" to all K-State folks who worked on food assistance projects at The Breadbasket in the past year.

During the 1989-90 year, The Breadbasket mission, which is to minimize hunger and poverty at the local level by coordinating food donation and distribution activities, has had its best success ever in implementing its goal, largely because of K-State's participation.

In 1989, over 640 volunteers provided 5,513 hours through various Breadbasket programs. Our records show that almost 60 percent of our volunteers, volunteer hours and the food received came from K-Staterelated groups during the year. Thank you for

In addition, we are proud of your involvement. As an institute of higher learning, K-State is number one in the State of Kansas on participation in community services that benefit the less fortunate. My sense of the national campus scene is that very few universities its size can match K-State's record of community outreach to help others. You can be proud of the fact that through helping social services such as The Breadbasket and others, you have truly contributed to the quality of life in Riley County.

Thank you for all your help.

Haskin wins NCAA championship

National meet ends with 6 'Cat All-Americans

By David Svoboda Sports Editor

K-State sophomore distance ace Janet Haskin won the national championship in the 10,000-meter run last Thursday at the NCAA Outdoor Track and Field Championships in Durham, N.C.

Haskin's effort set into motion a strong overall weekend performance for K-State, which had a total of six All-America showings by meet's end.

Joining Haskin in gaining All-America honors were Connie Teaberry in the high jump, Clifton Etheridge in the long jump, Steve Fritz in the decathlon and Angie Miller in the discus and shot put.

Haskin's performance was somewhat surprising, in that she was running the event for just the second time this season.

But when she crossed the finish line in a time of 33 minutes, 49.72 seconds, she had chopped over 50 seconds off of her previous career best and had become just the second woman in K-State history to win an NCAA title in track and

"It feels great," said Haskin, a native of Onaga. "Coming in, I was just hoping to get in the top six and be an All-American, but winning this is like a dream come true."

Georgetown's Christi Constantine threatened Haskin down the stretch, but the two-time previous All-American (in cross country and indoor track) from K-State held off her foe.

"I didn't think I had a chance until I caught the Harvard girl (Susanne Jones) and (Nebraska's Sammie) Gdowski," Haskin said of the race. "I'm not that familiar with this long of a race, so I was just keying off other people to see what they did."

Teaberry's fourth-place showing in the high jump was her highest placing ever at the NCAA Championships. She previously won All-America honors by placing ninth at the 1989 NCAA Outdoor meet and sixth at this year's NCAA Indoor competition.

Etheridge took 10th in the long jump, turning in the seventh-best performance by an American in the event. Fritz rallied during the second day of decathlon competition to jump from seventh place to fourth. He earned All-America honors for a second-straight year.

The Wildcat senior set personal records in three of five events on the final day, but it wasn't enough to catch Southwest Texas State's Drew Fucci, who took the crown.

Fritz, however, still has the top collegiate score of the year. Fucci's winning 7,922 points were two short of the record 7,924 Fritz set at the Big Eight meet two weeks ago.

Miller was ninth in the discus and sixth in the shot put. Her effort in the shot put final added three points to the Wildcat women's team total, lifting K-State to a 15th-place finish. That was K-State's best finish as a team in the women's portion of the outdoor meet since 1986, when current athletic director Steve Miller's team placed 12th.

The six All-America performances by K-State athletes raised to 33 the total of such showings under current cross country and track coach John Capriotti.

"It was a great year," Capriotti said. "We had an outstanding conference meet and an outstanding national meet, capped by Janet's winning an NCAA championship. I'm very happy."

K-State distance runner Janet Haskin (center) won the NCAA Championship in the 10,000 meters last Thursday in Durham, N.C.

Duo to travel to Soviet Union

K-State basketball players John Rettiger and Wylie Howard were selected last week to represent the Wildcats on a Big Eight Conference team that will tour the Soviet Union later this

The team, coached by Missouri head coach Norm Stewart, will practice for three days beginning July 2 in Columbia, Mo., and will leave July 5 for 11 days in the Soviet Union.

The 15 players selected for the team were nominated by their coaches and chosen by the conference.

Four teams will compete against the Big Eight squad in the Soviet Union. Participants on the team are not the top players in the Big Eight because the conference wanted to give less experienced players a chance to play in Europe, a conference spokesperson said.

Joining Rettiger and Howard on the team are Asad Ali and Rodell Guest of Colorado; Mike Bergman and Doug Collins of Iowa State; Shawn Davis and Corey Williams of Oklahoma State; Carl Hayes and Dapreis Owens of Nebraska; Chris Heller and Jeff Warren of Missouri; Adonis Jordan and Mike Maddox of Kansas; and Kermit Holmes of Oklahoma.

Women's select team chosen

A pair of K-State women's basketball players - Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim - were among 10 players selected to comprise the first-ever Big Eight Women's Select Basketball Team. The squad, to be coached by Nebraska's Angela Beck, will tour Prague, Czechoslovakia, beginning June 15. The 10-day Grand Prix Tournament in which the team will compete includes several of the top teams in the world.

Beck said the K-State players were chosen for different

"Nadira and Diana are going to have to put the ball up for us because they are two of the better players in the league," she said. "We chose Diana because of her outside shooting and Nadira for her speed and quickness. I'm very excited to have those two players on the team."

Other women on the squad will be Liz Brown of Oklahoma State; Lynne Lorenzen of Iowa State; Debbie Johnson of Colorado; Danielle Shareef of Kansas; Lisa Sandbothe of Missouri; Angie Alexander of Oklahoma; and Kelly Hubert and Karen Jennings of Nebraska.

Academic honor received

Kevin Kaufman, a senior designated hitter on the Wildcat baseball team, has been named third-team GTE-CoSIDA Academic All-America.

Kaufman, who will complete work on his accounting degree

Malham leaving K-State

Jeff Malham, a 6-6 forward on the Wildcat basketball team, has decided to transfer to Northeastern Oklahoma A&M Junior College and will not return to the squad in the fall, K-State coach Dana Altman announced.

Malham, who was a redshirt during the 1988-89 season, saw playing time in 12 games, averaging slightly more than one point and rebound per contest.

Title changes announced

Athletic Director Steve Miller recently announced changes in the titles of several administrators in the department.

Jim Epps has been promoted from associate athletic director to senior associate director. Assistant ADs Chris Peterson and Jeff Schemmel have moved to the associate level, with Schemmel now handling the department's compliance with NCAA regulations and athletes' certification.

Three employees with previous positions in the department are now assistant athletic directors. They include Craig Renfro, director of the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund; Paul Kowalczyk, business manager; and Mark Bonjour, director of facilities.

Hierholzer named all-region

K-State's two-time all-Big Eight pitcher David Hierholzer has been named to the first team of the American Baseball Coaches Association's All-Midwest Region team.

Hierholzer's name will now appear on the ABCA All-America ballot. The senior from Overland Park was 7-5 in 1990 with a 3.33 ERA. He struck out 90, threw two shutouts and had a streak of 40 innings in which he did not allow any earned runs.

Eight K-State baseball players and head coach Mike Clark earned Big Eight Conference recognition for their accomplishments on the field in 1990, the conference office has announced. Clark was named Big Eight Coach of the Year in balloting by the conference's seven baseball coaches. Colorado does not field a baseball program. In addition, pitcher David Hierholzer was named a first-team all-Big Eight performer for the second consecutive year.

The second team included shortstop Craig Wilson and pitchers Steve Scoville and Kent Hipp. Honorable mention choices included outfielder Brian Culp, second baseman Jeff Troll, designated hitter Kevin Kaufman and catcher Dan Skala.

Skala was also named by the conference's umpiring staff as the winner of the Enos Semore Sportsmanship award.

The Wildcats finished the regular season at 30-25 overall and 13-11 in Big Eight play - good for second place in the loop. In so doing, they qualified for the four-team postseason classic in Oklahoma City for the first time since 1985.

And though K-State dropped its only two contests in the tourney first to Nebraska and then to Iowa State - Clark said the experience his relatively young team gained by making a postseason trip was invaluable.

"I think it's huge. Our players know we can compete at this level now," Clark said. "It's a young group, and gaining experience in situations like these isn't something you can practice. You have to experience it.'

And in order for K-State to repeat the successes it enjoyed on the diamond in 1990, Clark said the experience must be turned into increases in work and skill levels.

"If our players do accept the challenges we put before them and push themselves, we'll grow and become better with the competition," Clark said. "We want to apply what we were able to do this year and do even more next year."

Clark said that doing even more is vital in a conference that saw the five ■ See BASEBALL, Page 8

Pistons, 'Blazers set for NBA Finals

By The Associated Press

PORTLAND, Ore. - The Portland Trail Blazers left for Detroit on Sunday insisting they won't be intimidated by the Pistons in the NBA Finals.

"We have to play them at their place, but we match up well with them," coach Rick Adelman said. "We know that they're good, but we know we can play with them."

The Blazers worked out at a suburban high school, then went home to watch the second half of Game 7 of the Eastern Conference finals between Detroit and Chicago. The Pistons won 93-74. Adelman had expected the Pistons to win all along, too.

"When you're going for the championship, it's nice to be playing the defending champions," he said. The finals will feature two teams that often struggle with their shooting but win with defense and rebounding.

"We're just as physical as they are," Portland forward Buck Williams said. "It all depends on which team can make the adjustments and control the tempo of the basketball game. Both teams are real good defensively. It's going to be a good defensive series. "To have a championship team,

Tornadoes hit Illinois, Indiana; killed

By The Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS - A band of tornadoes cut through the nation's midsection Saturday, killing at least eight people and injuring at least 150 in Indiana and leaving one dead in Illinois, authorities said.

Gov. Evan Bayh declared a state of emergency and dispatched the Indiana National Guard to Bedford and Petersburg, the two hardest hit areas.

Elsewhere, storms swept across Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin, knocking down trees, disrupting utility service and destroying homes and businesses.

At least four tornadoes skipped across southern and central Indiana, touching down about 50 times, said Jerry Hauer, director of the state Department of Emergency Management.

Hauer said seven people were confirmed killed in Indiana - three in Petersburg, three in Bedford and one in Putnam County.

"It's incredible. I've never seen anything like this. Everything's just shut down," said Randall J. Harris, news director at radio station WFPC in Petersburg.

The city, which is about 30 miles north of Evansville, was in shambles, he said.

One woman was killed in Putnam County when her mobile home overturned, said Hendricks County sheriff's Lt. Steve Golden. She was dead on arrival at Hendricks Memorial Hospital in Danville, said John Komenda, hospital vice president.

Komenda said many people had been brought to the hospital for treatment of injuries, but he did not know how many.

"It's just been pretty hectic here all night," he said.

Bedford Police Chief Dean Duncan said one person was killed and several were injured when a tornado struck the Pride Estates mobile home park southeast of Bedford.

"We've had a very serious outbreak," Hauer said, adding that the Federal Emergency Management Agency was notified. "It could be many hours before we know the full magnitude of the damage."

Hauer said the storm was the worst to hit Indiana since 1974, when about a dozen tornadoes touched down.

In Illinois, tornadoes destroyed or damaged scores of homes, killing a woman in the southeastern town of Browns and injuring at least eight people in Findlay and Newton counties, officials said.

Officials concerned about leaks shut off electricity and gas service in Findlay, with a population of about 800, after 11 homes were destroyed and 25 others were damaged.

Dozens of people were taken to Dunn Memorial Hospital after a tornado whipped through that area shortly after 8 p.m., hospital spokesperson Evelyn Williams said. A restaurant, service station and convenience store were destroyed south of Bedford, witnesses said. National Guardsmen helped with medical aid and cleanup.

Hauer said many of the injured were in a nursing home in Petersburg and a restaurant in Bedford.

Indiana State Police in Lafayette reported extensive damage in Montgomery County, where a tornado cut through an area northeast of Crawfordsville to the southwestern tip of Clinton County.

"We've got homes down and people we're trying to locate," a Montgomery County sheriff's dispatcher "Houses are down. Vehicles are overturned, powerlines down," state policeman Dave Murray said of Montgomery County. "Some houses are reported down."

Murray said authorities went doorto-door along Indiana 47 to check on residents after at least two tornadoes touched down in Boone County near the highway. In Wisconsin, several thousand residents of Fond du Lac, an eastern Wisconsin city of 36,000, were temporarily without electric service as tree limbs tore down transmission lines. No serious injuries were reported.

Vern Myren, who lives in Eau Claire County in northwestern Wisconsin, said wind uprooted trees and blew down a garage, causing an adjoining garage to collapse.

Thunderstorms with wind gusts up to 70 mph and hail moved across parts of southeastern and east-central Minnesota.

A tornado damaged four farms Saturday one mile east of Goodhue in southeastern Minnesota, but no injuries were reported, authorities said.

In Kentucky, a tornado touched down in Morgan County, overturning a house trailer and damaging two others, but no injuries were reported, authorities said.

Belew roars on new album

'Young Lions' latest effort from guitarist

By Rod Gillespie Collegian Reviewer

Adrian Belew has arrived with a roar.

"Young Lions" is the innovative guitarist's finest solo effort to date. Lyrically, "Young Lions" is sensitive, intelligent and politically incisive - without raw, heavy-handed cynicism. Musically, the album is reminiscent of his stints with David Bowie, Frank Zappa and Robert Fripp - yet still manages to enter uncharted fretboard territory.

Laboring as a session man in the shadows of such musical giants, Belew has never been known as a fret-shredding axeman. Instead, he has made his name as a sonic artist, creating otherworldly sounds with an imaginative, often bizarre technique. His arsenal of noises helped create the King Crimson "Discip-line" and Bowie "Scary Monsters"

"Young Lions" enlarges on that early '80s sound. It is not a complete departure from Belew's musical past, however: the album sports a remake of King Crimson's "Heartbeat" and Bowie's vocals on "Gunman" and "Pretty Pink Rose." Expect to hear the latter two cuts when Belew plays guitar for Bowie's tour this summer.

"Gunman" is a stinging indictment of our firearm-obsessed society, in which gunslinging good guys rule the television airwaves - but drug-dealing, pistol-packing punks rule the streets. 'Pretty Pink Rose" is probably the track destined for the heaviest airplay on alternative music stations. Bowie's silky, soulful vocals combine with Belew's tight, shimmering guitar for a tasty bit of aural

Belew is responsible for most of the instrumentation on the album, although the Van Kampen percussion ensemble helps out on the title cut and string bassists Ellen Gieles and Mike Barnett provide the moody backdrop for "Phone Call From the Moon," the melancholy ballad of a man isolated from his family.

"Phone Call From the Moon" is just one of several thoughtfully written pieces on "Young Lions." Belew shares his concerns about the Earth on "Looking for a U.F.O." and "Men in Helicopters." In "Looking for a U.F.O.," Belew laments man's inhumanity to his fellow man - and looks to the heavens for some sort of extraterrestrial rescue:

Somebody will have to fall out of the skylsomebody to show us

Homelessness target of awareness month

By Tomari Quinn Campus/City Editor

June has been designated as "Hope for the Homeless" month in a campaign by the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc.

The campaign is an effort to raise public awareness about the homelessness situation, said Kathy Rankin, executive director of the emergency shelter.

"Primarily, it will be a month of trying to educate the community on homelessness," Rankin said. "Initially, we're going to send support letters out, and we'll try to appear on early morning shows.

Rankin said the Manhattan area ranks above the state average in the number of homeless. The state counts only permanent residents, which would exclude many of the K-State students.

"We housed one in 50.5 community members in the past year," she said. "That is above the norm."

Manhattan Mayor Richard Hayter said every community must address the problems of the homeless, and the city government will continue to work with the emergency shelter throughout the awareness month to try to decrease the problem.

The shelter also works with those people who are unemployed or are holding part-time jobs.

"If we were not here, they would end up in another community on the streets," Rankin said.

By providing a support network and guidance, the staff at the shelter attempts to get the homeless back into the community with a good chance of staying there, she said.

She said more than 76 percent of Manhattan's homeless were born and raised in the Manhattan area. Many had held solid jobs, but became homeless under a number of circumstances such as the loss of a job after an illness or when a car broke down.

A press conference from 6 to 6:30 p.m. today at the shelter will mark the beginning of the awareness month, Rankin said. The conference will feature Hayter, representatives Sheila Hochhauser and Katha Hurt, former Manhattan Mayor Kent Glasscock and Phil Dubach, who is from the office of housing in Topeka.

Also present will be Paul Geib from the Department of Education in Washington, D.C., Rankin said. Geib will be in town to tour the shelter and observe the staff's activities.

Many people cannot wait until the end of the day so they can go home and sleep. After working eight hours, or spending 10 hours on campus studying, a good night's sleep is needed.

What many people may not realize is that what they sleep on makes a difference in their health.

The first thing I ask my patients when they come into my office is 'Where do you sleep?'" said Dr. Gregory Gehlhoff, chiropractic physician.

Where you sleep, whether it is on the floor, a conventional mattress set, a waterbed, a futon or a couch, affects your health, Gehlhoff said.

The best thing to sleep on is a firm, regular mattress set with box springs and a pillow," Gehlhoff said.

If the mattress sags in the middle, or gets too soft, Gehlhoff said he recommends putting a board under the mattress.

waterbeds and are having problems, I tell them to add more water," he said.

Sleeping on the floor is simply not good, Gehlhoff said.

Gehlhoff said worn mattresses can increase stress on the spine and causes problems such as back problems, headaches, chest pains, neck problems, muscle aches and leg pain.

Mattress sets cannot last forever, according to a 1984 Consumer Reports' article.

"Over time, any mattress that is used regularly will show signs of wear," he article said.

A conventional mattress be-"If patients are sleeping on comes solver as it ages and a futon mattress becomes firmer, said Bill Kaszer, owner of the Aggieville Futon Store.

"The major difference between a futon mattress and a conventional mattress set is what it's made of," Kaszer said.

A futon mattress is made of layers of cotton batting, which resembles white fiberglass insulation, and a conventional mattress set that is made of springs and layers of cushioning, Kaszer said.

"Springs break and the cushioning deteriorates and cotton doesn't have those problems," Kaszer said.

A futon is generally less expensive than a conventional mattress set, Kaszer said.

College students face high cost if they plan to invest in a top of the line mattress. The highest quality Sealy Posturepedic twin-size mattress can cost up to $950, a spokesperson said.

College students are usually looking for a good deal, Gehlhoff said.

He said that in addition to problems caused by sleeping arrangements, students often compound those problems by sitting in chairs that are hard on the back all day and carrying backpacks on one shoulder.

"This puts an increased amount of stress on the spine," Gehlhoff said.

Students to spend summer studying Spanish in Mexico

By Donna Warren Collegian Reporter

The mountain tropics of Mexico will be the summer habitat for 12 students attending summer school at the Universidad Veracruzana in Xalapa.

Margaret Beeson, associate professor of Spanish, has been coordinator for the annual trip since 1965. She said the students will be living with Mexican host families while attending classes from June 18 to July 29.

Beeson said the students will enroll in two courses, such as Mexican history, Spanish literature, Spanish grammar and Mexican folklore. They will participate in the classes as regular students and receive six hours of college credit. Because the courses are taught in Spanish, they will transfer to K-State as Spanish

Beeson said the students will also receive assistance from tutors who will work with them two or three hours each week. Cindy Wegman, junior in psychology, went on the trip last summer. She said the tutors were helpful in areas besides school work.

"My tutor worked with me two or three times a week and also walked around with me so I could learn my Spanish conversations," Wegman

"Not only did my Spanish improve tremendously, but it was also interesting to get to know (the Mexican people), their lifestyle and way of life," she said. Matt Whitney, junior in secondary Spanish education, will be making the trip for the second time. He went for the first time in 1988.

"I want to go again for the benefit of furthering my education and because I have a deep appreciation for the culture of Mexico," Whitney

He said he likes Xalapa and its people. He said their lifestyle is so much more relaxed than it is in the United States that it took a couple of weeks for him to slow down to their Beeson said this is the fifth year the students have traveled to Xalapa. The group used to stay in Mexico City but decided to go elsewhere because of the smog, crime and large size of Mexico City.

Xalapa is about the size of Wichita and is often referred to as the "City of ber of orchids and other flowers way around the city and practice my which grow there, Beeson said. It is near the location where the movie 'Romancing the Stone" was filmed.

"In addition to the beautiful scenery, Xalapa has a very comfortable climate without all the pollution of Mexico City," Beeson said. Beeson said the Universidad Veracruzana is a major university and one of the better schools in Mexico. She said it has the finest symphony orchestra in Central America and provides many cultural opportunities for the students.

Maureen Ihrie, assistant professor of Spanish, will be the only K-State faculty member going and will be the on-site director for the trip. Beeson said the main reason Ihrie will be there is to make sure everything goes smoothly and to handle any problems that occur.

One weekend during the summer, the students will travel further south to visit Mayan ruins and relax on the beach, Beeson said.

The students will also spend the final three days of the trip in Mexico

Beeson said the cost of the trip is about $1,800. She said this includes Flowers" because of the large num- room and board, transportation, books and tuition.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - In the last four years, an abortion-performing doctor who flunked state licensing exams at least eight times has settled five malpractice suits with claims totaling nearly $2 million, according to The Kansas City Star.

The Star said in Sunday's editions that Dr. Dennis W. Miller of Kansas City, Kan., had a series of medical mishaps, some of which proved fatal. Miller, 41, continues to practice medicine at his office in Kansas City, Kan., and at Comprehensive Health for Women in Overland Park, Kan. A sixth lawsuit settlement went

Governor hopefuls

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - Fred Phelps filed Wednesday for Democratic governor nomination, the last of six declared candidates for the two party gubernatorial nominations in the Aug. 7 primary election.

He became the third Democrat to file for governor. Three Republicans also have filed, including incumbent Gov. Mike Hayden.

The filing deadline is noon next

Phelps, 60, a Topeka Baptist minister and former attorney, and his lieutenant governor running mate, K.C. Groves, a retired postal employee from Kansas City, Kan., paid the $939 filing fee in the secretary of state's office to place their names on the primary ballot.

Former Gov. John Carlin and Treasurer Joan Finney, along with their running mates, had filed previously for the Democratic nomination.

Nestor Weigand and Richard Peckham, both of Wichita, also have filed to challenge Hayden in the Republican primary.

Also filing Wednesday were Leroy Jones of Lenexa, seeking Democratic nomination to Congress in the 3rd District of suburban Kansas City, and three present members of the Kansas House of Representatives, Republican David J. Heinemann of Garden City and Democrats Anthony Hensley and Bill Roy Jr. of Topeka.

Heinemann and Hensley filed for renomination in their present districts. Roy, whose central Topeka district was eliminated by reappo tionment, filed in the south Topeka district where incumbent Republican Bill Bunten is retiring.

Among the others filing for nomination to the Kansas House was Phillip Urban of Leavenworth, the chairman of the Kansas Taxpayers Coalition. Urban is challenging incumbent Republican Martha Jenkins in the primary in the 42nd House District. Former state Rep. E. Dean Shelor of Dodge City also filed for Democratic nomination in the 116th District, while Ed McKechnie of Pittsburg, a former aide to House Minority Leader Marvin Barkis, filed for the Democratic nomination in the 3rd District where Republican Larry Wilbert is retiring.

Twenty-four more candidates added their names to the August ballot Wednesday, bringing to 291 the number filed so far, with 2 1-2 filing days remaining before the deadline. Four years ago, when a comparable number of offices were up for election, 324 people filed.

Phelps told reporters at a news conference preceding his filing that he would reject the $73,138 annual salary to be paid the governor in the next term if he is elected. He is having drafted what he called an irrevocable assignment of income that he plans to sign Monday and give to state officials.

Phelps said his decision to serve without pay if elected should provide an example to other public officials to do something to reduce the cost of government. He said Kansas should have a system under which citizens serve in public office for a time, without pay, then return to their civilian

He also attacked educational funding in the state, calling the Margin of Excellence of enhanced funding for universities a fraudulent scheme designed to waste more tax money on a fundamentally flawed educational system in Kansas.

Phelps said the state's public education system receives too much money, not too little, and accused Kansas-National Education Association of peddling lies to deceive the people about the costs of education. Jones, 39, paid the $966 fee to file for the Democratic nomination in the 3rd Congressional District, where Construction currently taking place on Mid Campus Drive could impede traffic and pedestrian crossings, said Jack Watson, assistant director for building maintenance.

Watson said major steamline renovations require 20-foot lengths of the pipe to be removed from the steam tunnels.

"The contractor has to set up a crane in the street to pull it out," Watson said. "It could be a hazard to pedestrians or people walking by because it's hard to control the pipe when it is swinging out on a boom."

Watson said one foot of the pipe weighs about 60 pounds, so a 20-foot section would weigh about 1,200 pounds.

The high-, medium- and lowpressure lines provide power to more than 85 percent of the campus, said Lee McQueen, assistant director of facilities engineering. Currently, the high- and lowpressure steamlines are shut down while the medium-pressure steamlines will provide all steam north of the power plant for the remainder of the summer, he said. The mediumpressure lines received minor repairs during a total shut-down of the steamlines earlier in the month.

McQueen said the high-pressure steamlines are not in good mechanical shape, which is why the lines are being removed. He said they hope to be able to use much of the piping when re-installing the steamline.

The removal of the pipe began at the power plant, traveled up Mid Campus Drive to Claflin Road, and it will impede traffic at Claflin and Denison from Saturday to Wednesday, Watson said.

'It's really going well so far," he said. "It takes a lot of coordination to make it work."

Construction is being done by Central Mechanical Construction of Manhattan, McQueen said. The estimated cost of the repair project is

Staff taking classes free from health fee

By David Frese

Beginning this fall, the student health fee for University faculty and staff members who are enrolled in classes will be elimipocket.

Though the elimination of the fee will create a revenue loss for because they were carrying health Lafene Student Health Center, it will take much more than that to put the center into the red, Director of Student Health Lannie Zweimiller said Wednesday. He also said he was more concerned for those who will lose access to the center's services.

'A waiver of the student health fee for faculty and staff members who take classes basically eliminates their access to student health services," Zweimiller said.

"It also takes away approximately $22,000 of our revenue that would have come to the health center in fiscal year '91. We're a business, and when that money is cut, as a business we must find ways to make up that revenue. Basically, it creates a financial problem which we have to

In 1987, a task force was formed to look at the student health services on campus, and the group recommended Lafene keep at least 26 percent of the total annual fiscal budget on reserve at the end of each year.

With the cessation of money from faculty and staff members enrolled in classes, the maintenance of a 26 percent reserve will make book-balancing that much tougher.

'For fiscal year '91, 26 percent of the operating budget could be as much as $750,000. To maintain that reserve, you've got to maintain your fiscal integrity, somehow," Zweimiller said.

The purpose of the fee waiver was to benefit faculty and staff members who thought they were nated, taking $22,000 out of paying twice for a service they Lafene Student Health Center's might never have used in the first place. "Faculty and staff members felt > that they were being double-charged. They were paying the student health fee as well as paying for their own health insurance. But that's not the case, Zweimiller said. The student health fee insurance, their perception was is neither a user fee nor a form of insurance, but is instead a fee to support the well-being and general upkeep of the student health center. It also helps subsidize the center so charges for health care remain low. 'It's a support fee, like you would pay for a road or a hospital that you wouldn't necessarily use, but support," he said.

"We've had a hard time reducing expenditures right now and maintaining the level of service students are used to. Reducing services is always an option to

The closing of the midnight to 8 a.m. after-hours shift saved Lafene approximately $25,000, but that money went to the enhancement of other programs within Lafene, Zweimiller said.

"At this time we're looking at maintaining services. Financially we're doing OK at the present time even with the loss of $22,000 in health fees, but we have to look down the road and just work knowing that that's $22,000 we won't have.'

World Britain introduces new money

LONDON (AP) - Britain introduced a smaller five pound note Wednesday that includes a new engraving of a gracefully aging queen and a few other changes designed to combat hightech forgeries.

The new note will be released into circulation on Thursday. "No item created by man can't be recreated," Nigel Bevitt-Smith of the Bank of England's printing works said of potential forgeries. "What we try to do is to make it time-consuming and as expensive as possible.' The five-pound notes have been reduced in size from 5.7-by-3 inches to 5.3-by-2.7 inches, which should reduce government production costs. Among the other changes, the dominant blue in the notes was lightened from navy to turquoise, and a blend of background colors was created to challenge sophisticated forgers who use modern color reproduction machines. Also, the position and color of the numbers was changed and a silver-colored thread running through the note was added.

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil (AP) - The script called for President Fernando Collor de Mello to set fire to a pile of seized cocaine and marijuana to promote his anti-drug campaign, but it didn't work out that way.

Instead, TV viewers saw the gas-soaked pile of drugs explode in flames as Collor dropped a torch onto it, and the president cover his face and run back.

Fortunately, the heat only singed Collor's right ear, hair and forearm, and he was not seriously hurt, the government news agency said Wednesday.

The assailant was caught by Secret Service and Capitol police officers. Secret Service spokesman Allan Cramer said Mwenea Sikuzote of St. Thomas, V.I., had been charged with assaulting the vice president.

"The guy shouted 'I have documents,' and proceeded to throw some," as the vice president emerged from the Hart Senate Office Building from his weekly lunch with GOP senators, said Beckwith.

Campus faces hiring freeze

A hiring freeze was issued May 21 for all University positions on state funds, but does not affect positions on grants and

Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, said if someone had resigned or retired after May 21, their position would not be filled.

"Some instances we would hire," Rawson said, "Like if there was a turnover in the KSU Police Department. We would need to fill those positions."

He said the freeze would remain in effect until the budget can be evaluated.

"We did this because of the severe budget crunch," Rawson said. "We did it in order to keep options open while getting the budget together.'

On June 15, Rawson, President Jon Wefald, Provost James Coffman and Bob Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, will consider whether the freeze should be lifted or Rawson said the freeze will be lifted if all financial targets have been met by the June meeting.

"I don't think this freeze will affect summer classes," said Charles Reagan, executive assistant to the president. "The deans are assessing the impact the budget has on classes in the fall." Reagan said he and other administrators will be working on juggling schedules and class sizes. He said they want to make sure all students have the classes they want and need. "We are making sure that we can accommodate the student given the bad situation (with the budget)," Reagan said.

Registrar Don Foster said he had thought the enrollment figures would be close to last summer and hadn't expected the 12 percent increase.

Foster said several factors play a role in the enrollment increase.

"Part of the increase represents the large freshman classes of the past few years," he said. "As these stuof them decide to take summer classes to keep on schedule."

Foster said the increase in numbers might reflect the economic status of the state.

Health leaders discuss state immunization rule

Lafene Student Health Services came a step closer to implementing a mandatory immunizations policy for the University last month.

In May, several directors of student health services for the Kansas universities met to discuss the possibility of a resolution that would ask the Board of Regents to consider a mandatory immunization policy for state universities, said Lannie Zweimiller, director of student health.

K-State's current immunization policy consists of one sentence in the 1988-90 University catalog and is rarely enforced, Zweimiller said. Outbreaks of measles in the last two spring semesters have wreaked havoc with Lafene's record keeping.

Without current innoculation records, he said, students must fill out a form detailing their medical history before being seen by a doctor. A more strictly enforced immunization policy would reduce the risks of disease outbreak considerably and would speed up the healing process.

requiring immunizations for primary- and secondary-level students in the state of Kansas.

"The reason behind us wanting to implement a mandatory policy is that the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta is in the process now of getting ready to mandate an immunization policy for colleges and universities in the nation," he said. "We would like to get ahead of that, and already have a policy in place before that happens.

Zweimiller said an immunization policy is a good thing to have because of the large and diverse population at the University and to prevent further outbreaks, such as those witnessed in the past two spring

The cost of not having a policy in place has two sides, Zweimiller said. There is the financial cost to the health center on one hand, and the cost to these students of lost time away from the classroom and so forth on the other," he said.

The measles outbreaks possibly Zweimiller said the resolution is could have been cradicated had there

Larry Moeller, chief of staff at Lafene, said the measles outbreak at the University this spring resulted in 42 cases, up rom about 12 cases last

"If we get everybody who is susceptible to measles, mumps and rubella — then outbreaks like we've had the last two years will be either nonexistent or minimal," Moeller said. "We had 42 cases of the measles at the end of the semester, so everybody who had it took it back to where they came from."

Outbreaks can cause a strain on campus medical facilities.

"When we have those outbreaks we have deluges of students coming in needing immunizations or are sick, and that creates an extra burden on our services," Zweimiller said. The Student Health Advisory Committee passed a proposed immu-■ See IMMUNE, Page 10

Agencies receive funding

Manhattan approves allocations

By Gregory A. Branson

The allocation of nearly $200,000 for use in 11 local social service programs was approved Tuesday by the Manhattan City Commission.

Linda Thurston, corresponding secretary for the Social Services Advisory Board, presented a report to the commissioners recommending how the $194 684 should be distributed to the agencies.

The advisory board received applications in January from 11 social agencies and programs from the Manhattan area seeking funding from the city.

Thurston said the board then assigned two members to each agency that applied to study how the funds would be used. A public hearing was held in April, which gave the agencies a chance to make a presentation before the whole board.

Several other meetings were held where board members voted on which agencies should be allocated money and how much.

"No agency received full funding," Thurston said, "but we thought several may have deserved it."

Of the 11 agencies that applied, 10 received funding from the city last year and the other one received funding the year before. All of the agencies received some funding from the city this year.

Mayor Richard Hayter and Commissioner Roger Maughmer questioned the drop in funding of almost $6,000 for the city's subsidized taxi program for handicapped and elderly

Thurston said the program hadn't spent all the money allocated to it from last year. She also said the board thought the program could use some improvements such as new income guidelines and ways to restrict the use of the coupons to eligible riddividuals have no alternative.

Stormy Kennedy, president of the HOME program, appealed to the commissioners to grant the program full funding. The board recommended $20,000 be allocated to the HOME program, about $6,000 less than was requested.

Kennedy said the program hires full-time supervisors to oversee volunteers. The program does maintenance on homes of people who aren't able to do the work themselves, including people with low income, handicaps and the elderly.

She said full funding is needed to hire the supervisors. Without the funding, she said, the program isn't viable. The commissioners didn't act on Kennedy's request.

Manhattan Day Care Center received $54,720, which was the largest grant. Maughmer asked if the board was looking into other ways of funding child care. He said he would rather help the individuals needing child care instead of the providers of the service.

Kennedy said the board was cur-Thurston said the elderly have a rently looking at alternatives and ■ See CITY, Page 9

Eyes opened at friend's baby shower

attended a baby shower for the first time a few weeks ago. If you have never been to a baby shower, you should seize the opportunity if it arises. It really is quite fun.

The shower was given for a friend of mine who, as you might have guessed, is expecting a baby. She is a neat person - you would really like her. I'm, sure she will be a wonderful mother.

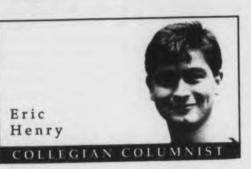

There were about 30 people at the shower, maybe more. I suppose half were male (and still are, I presume). Oddly enough, we fellows didn't migrate to the corners of the room to discuss sports, as you might think the case would be. I think most of us realized this was the fauthest into the women's sphere we had ever gone, except maybe for a panty raid or two, so it was understood amongst us we were to be on our best behavior.

Being a guy and social tradition being what it is, I hadn't been invited to a shower before. I'm not so sure I would have attended one in the past even if I had been asked. I must admit I felt pangs of trepidation when I received my velcro-backed combination baby tub/invitation. I pictured myself at the modern equivalent of a quilting bee, mired in ennui, cloaked in the smothering, mothering atmosphere of unbridled femininity.

But, to my surprise, the shower resonated with friendliness, with comraderie, with a sense of welcoming. I could tell the expectant parents were finding comfort in the knowledge they were bringing a child into this loving showerworld of friends and family. An unspoken message seemed to pervade the room. It said, "We are behind you all the way. We are excited about your baby. Have you tried one of those

Yes, there were the trappings and conventions of traditional showers, as a female friend would later reveal to me. There was a decorated cake, there was crepe paper. When the time came to open gifts, the mothers at the shower had the good taste to say things like, "Oh, you'll love that. Those are so useful. I don't know if I could have survived Sara's days in diapers without the changing pad." But there was an element of nontraditionalism about this shower. I had an inkling of this when I first spied the keg of beer. Then, I overheard some of the ladies quietly remarking about the conspicuous absence of dopey shower games and door prizes. It was when I found myself, crayons in hand, coloring pictures with two 5-year-olds, I knew I was experiencing something extraordinary. My life was suddenly better than a good episode of "thirtysomething." My masculinity had been affirmed. I was indelibly a man of the 1990s. Doesn't all this sound like the perfect script for a 1990s light-beer commercial - a man throwing caution to the wind and having a cold beer at a baby shower? Unfortunately, beer advertisers would obviously make the connection and make a regular, full-bodied-beer commercial about a burly guy who drinks a case of beer and fathers a dozen children in a single evening.

hy should it be so unusual for men to go to baby showers? The coming of a child seems like a good occasion to gather friends and celebrate as well as a time to learn about the mysteries of childbirth. Women and men could both benefit from attending baby showers together. The following are just a few of the important things I learned at my friend's shower: Giving birth makes passing kidney stones seem like a trip to Disney World. Stretch marks are not necessarily permanent, you will grow into them. You can never have too many changing pads. And, disposable diapers are an environmental and social faux pas in many circles.

It was a difficult job finding an ap-propriate gift. I didn't want to begin my shower-going career by giving something stupid, like a carton of cigarettes. Two of my buddies were suffering the same predicament so we decided to pool our money and buy one nice gift. Our first idea was a baseball mitt. "How gauche," one of my buddies said. "That's so passe," my other buddy said. "It is rather cliche," I agreed. We mulled over giving everything from an inexpensive chain saw to a gift certificate for baby food. We even thought about buying all the diapers we could afford but now-adays diapers are made differently for boys and girls. How much sense does that make? It is no wonder men and women don't go to baby showers together; we can't even wear the same kind of diapers in our society.

We finally decided to buy the smallest K-State sweatshirt we could find. It looked like it was the perfect size for a baby we figured. Everyone told us later the baby would "grow into it" by the time it was 4. Maybe now I understand why men aren't invited to showers.

Not what I expected is right. As a junior, I have enjoyed the last two Royal Purple yearbooks. Previous volumes displayed a wide variety of campus and local activities. This year, however, I felt Susan Hilt and her staff overlooked a few areas of K-State life.

The first group that was overlooked was the K-State Players. This is a group that performs six mainstage and two Purple Masque shows a year. During this school year, all three productions of the musical "Grease" sold out McCain Auditorium. The group took chances with performances of the show, "Good," and attempting the opera, "Cosi Fan Tutti," in the confines of Nichols Theatre. K-State Players' latest production, "Medea," could be a full entry in the American College Theatre Festival.

The next K-Stater to be ignored was Willie the Wildcat. Willie is the most important and visible K-Stater there is. Sure, I'm biased, but Willie is the best mascot in the Big Eight, if not one of the best in the country. I guess this is why he only received three tiny pictures in the entire Royal Purple. Probably the greatest omission was that of Kansas State's two Rhodes Scholars. To have one Rhodes Scholar is an honor, to have two is exceptional for any institution. Mary Hale and Janelle Larson did themselves and the University proud. All they got in return was a very small article, and two sentences on the

I do enjoy the Royal Purple. It is something else Kansas State has to be proud of. I also realize that on a campus of 20,000 not all groups can be covered, but these groups should have at least been mentioned. The Royal Purple staff was right, it's not what I

Groups overlooked Change criteria

What criteria should be used in awarding academic scholarships? Should scholarships be given on the basis of race, religion and culturistic background? Should these three traits be factored into a formula that determines academic awards? Well, if they are, the process of discrimination is occurring. Hmm, I thought that was a no-no?

It seems there should be two factors used in determining scholastic awards: financial need and merit. Merit being G.P.A.s, aptitude tests and etc. Using race, color or creed would be categoric discrimination. I thought we tried to avoid those things.

Don't misinterpret my letter. I believe that diversity is an essential ingredient of a wellrounded university. I've learned much from international students and students from cultures other than my own. But just because someone has a certain skin color, a certain god, or a certain culture does not mean he/she deserves a scholarship. Academic scholarships should be awarded on the basis of financial need and merit and nothing else.

Don't discriminate

Dear Mr. Wefald,

How kind of you to send out letters to the students of K-State encouraging them to be less racial. May I suggest that you establish a hiring practice that conforms to strict specifications, such as: 30 percent white; 30 percent black; 10 percent Spanish; 10 percent Chinese; 10 percent Indian; 10 percent other. Don't forget sex: 49 percent male; 49 percent female; 2 percent other. But wait, that's not all! How about religion: 25 percent Protestant; 25 percent Catholic; 25 percent Jewish; 5 percent atheist; 5 percent Satanic worshippers; 10 percent other. When will it stop? If you hire somebody who is a minority and yet less qualified than somebody who is in the majority, doesn't that cause that person to resent that minority person, thus creating even greater reason to hate minorities and increasing racism? What if you hired people and never got to look at them prior to their first day on the job? Stop asking who we are, and begin asking what we are. Stop changing your laws, and start changing your heart.

Child's walk led to case

By Margaret Clarkin

Walking five blocks to stand on a corner and wait for a bus to go to a school across town can be quite a journey for a

Yet that was what Linda Brown Buckner had to go through every day in the 1950s. Because public schools in Topeka were segregated, she was bused to an all-black school miles from her home.

"I remember some of those walks and it being very cold," Linda said. "I remember turning around and coming home before I got to the bus stop. I was crying because it was so Leola Brown Montgomery, widow of Oliver Brown, and her daughters, Linda and Cheryl, were part of a panel discussion at the Dwight D. Eisenhower Library in Abilene Tuesday about the Brown vs. Topeka Board of Education decision.

The women spoke at a con-ference on civil rights during the Eisenhower administration, which is part of a series of activities commemorating the centennial anniversary of Eisenhower's birthday.

"We thought about the long distance our daughter had to walk," Leola said. "Five long blocks, stand on a cold corner to catch a bus, then be bused two miles to an all-black school. We thought that was a little much for a 6-year-old child to have to do."

Linda said she remembers taking the bus across town, picking up black students and passing several white schools on the way. One of those schools was Sumner Elementary, which was located in the Browns' neighborhood.

"My parents were very upset because not only I, but the other children in the case in Topeka, had to walk so far to obtain a quality education," Linda/said.

Leola said she and her husband were willing to stick their necks out to help their daughter and the other children they might have.

Other blacks thought that we just wanted to do this so we could go to school with other races and that wasn't our thought behind our doing," Leola said. "We were trying to do it to help our children so they wouldn't have to be bused long distances when there were schools in their own neighborhoods."

Leola said they thought it would help their children to go to a nearby school not only with school work, but also with social activities and relations with other children.

Oliver tried to enroll Linda in Sumner, but she was turned down. Oliver, along with other black parents opposed to segregation, received legal help from their local chapter of the National Association for the

Minority staff vacate 6 positions

By Julie Andsager

In the wake of recent minority resignations, increased efforts to recruit and retain minority administrators and faculty are underway at K-State.

Six minority administrators and faculty members have resigned since June 1989: Vera Carr, K-State Union associate director; Rosalind Fisher, director of personnel; Joyce Hammond-Perry, assistant director of affirmative action; Jose Pereles, director of minority engineering programs; and Hakim Salahu-Din, assistant director of undergraduate admission.

"It seems as though - despite some of our very best and continuing efforts to enlarge our minority population - we keep losing ground, or maybe we're staying stable," said Robert Kruh, vice provost.

"We just have a problem on the national level with getting people educated to the highest level, especially minorities," Kruh said. "Competition among schools to get those minorities is stiff. It's a problem we're not addressing on a national level, let alone in Manhattan, Kansas.'

Fisher said for her, the University did not provide an environment conducive to minority growth.

"I was given a job to do, and then the resources weren't there," Fisher said. "It seemed as if I was set up for failure. You try to give 100 percent and end up giving 150 percent."

Fisher said a minority person must perform well in a job situation because that performance reflects not only on him or her, but on the entire minority community. "If something goes wrong, it's not

"As far as autonomy and decisionmaking authority, I was told these would not increase," she said.

Shirley Marshall, former assistant personnel director, also resigned, but for career reasons. She said she had been offered a temporary position in personnel, then left when she found a teaching position more suited to her goals. Being a minority did not seem to affect her stay at the University, Marshall said.

Being unable to instigate improvements in the minority environment affected Hammond-Perry's decision to leave K-State, she said. She said when several minority employees at the University shared stories, many Fisher said in addition to her job duties, she served on 12 committees during the spring semester. In many situations, she said she was on the committees in part as a minority representative.

Hammond-Perry did not have to do excessive committee work, she said, but she was not employed at the University as long as Fisher.

"I'm not upset at K-State," Fisher said. "But this system is based on a white male standard that no longer applies. It's not flexible. Until it is, people will not stay."

"I think a year ago, recruitment was beginning to improve, and retention was the problem," Hammond-Perry said. "Now, I think after these resignations, they will have problems with recruitment, because all a potential recruit has to do is pick up the phone and talk to us about our experience."

New finance plan to aid minorities

By Gregory A. Branson

Some minority students at K-State will receive additional grant, scholarship and work study financial aid in an effort to lessen the burden of repaying student loans.

Larry Viterna, student financial assistance director, said some students' financial aid is being repackaged in an effort to retain more minority students at the University.

A report from the 1989 Task Force on Minority Student Retention said many minority students fail to return to college because of financial pressures.

"Studies show that minority students who are not faced with insurmountable financial problems tend to stay for a degree," Viterna said.

Some minority students receive large student and parental loans when they get their financial aid packages. This puts a financial burden on the students to repay the loan in addition to the interest of the loan, the report said. "It's obvious people can function better, whether it be learning or on a job, without the worry of repaying a loan looming over them," Viterna said. "Several national studies have told us that.'

The report recommends that loans be reduced to less than 22 percent of a student's aid. Although the current repackaging didn't meet that goal, it is reduced to 30 percent for in-state students and 35 percent for nonresident students, said Christine Crenshaw, associate director of Student Financial Assistance. The report also recommended that financial aid account for 100 percent of minority students' financial need. Financial need is the difference between costs to go to school - tuition, room, board, transportation and supplies - and what the family and student can contribute.

"This year we estimate it will cost a student $6,950 to go to K-State," Viterna said. "If the family can pay $3,000 of that, then we try to come up with the other $3,950.

He said that in most cases, K-State can meet 100 percent of the need of students, including minority and non-resident students. The exceptions are students with large needs such as special medical needs or dependents.

In order to supplement a need of 100 percent, several types of loans are used, Viterna said. Low interest loans such as Perkins and Stafford loans are given priority, but sometimes supplemental and parental loans must be used. These loans can have interest rates as high as 12 percent.

In order to provide more funds for minorities to avoid loans, the University is trying to establish more scholarships and grants specifically for minorities with funds from private industry and the Essential Edge campaign.

"No money is being taken from other scholarships or funds," Viterna said. "Instead, we are increasing the money directed for minorities at a slightly faster rate than for open scholarships."

Between 250 and 300 students could be affected by the financial aid repackaging, Crenshaw said. Priority is based on high need and if the student turned in their application by the March 15 priority deadline.

Crenshaw said the 22 percent goal won't be reached without a great deal more federal funding for scholarships and work study programs.

College awarded fellowships Holen said the College of Educa-

Program funds for minorities

By Tomari Quinn Campus/City Editor

A federally funded program is allowing K-State to increase minority representation in the graduate

Mike Holen, acting dean of education, said the University has been awarded 22 renewable Patricia Roberts Harris Fellowships. The program is administered through the U.S. Department of Education. It provides a $10,000 support grant and a $6,000 additional stipend for tuition and supplies for each student. All of the doctoral fellows are black and will be in the College of Education for the 1990-91 school year, Holen said.

Competitive institutions vie for the fellowships through proposals detailing the nature of the program and recruiting plans with an emphasis placed on minority students, he said. K-State's proposal finished in a tie with Stanford University for second in the nation behind Howard University.

"The program has brought us a large number of high-quality students that have already had an impact on the faculty and students in terms of cultural diversity," Holen said.

Two sections exist in the fellowship program at K-State. Holen said the first is a cooperative program with Grambling University and has been in implementation for two years. Recipients of those fellowships may come from any historically black college in Louisiana and are funded through Grambling.

Clara Wilson-Cook, doctoral student in student personnel administration in higher education, is on sabbatical from the University of New Orleans, where she is an assistant professor.

"The program has been a godsend," she said. "I would certainly like to see other minorities take advantage of the program."

The second program is K-State's alone, Holen said. It will allow seven doctoral fellows to enroll in the fall.

Holen said it is important to get more minorities into teaching positions, because by the year 2000, four out of 10 students in public schools will be races other than white. The number of minority teachers is dropping, he said.

"It's quite clear that unless the colleges turn out teachers with multicultural sensitivities, there could be a real problem," Holen said. "We're giving our students a leg up on the sensitivities they will need when they face the real world of teaching.

"It also helps to draw in other graduate students that are minorities by their presence," he said.

Wilson-Cook said she was disappointed by the lack of minorities upon her arrival to K-State.

"Coming from the South, it was quite an awakening," she said. "The minority students I come in contact with at K-State need to have role models to identify with. K-State falls a little short of that."

Head track and cross country coach John Capriotti counsels distance runner David Keller before a race during the fall 1989 cross country season. Capriotti has coached 33 All-Americans during his tenure at K-State, including national champion Janet Haskin in 1990.

Coach pleased with showings at NCAAs

By David Svoboda Sports Editor

John Capriotti is satisfied - for

The K-State track and field coach is coming off an NCAA outdoor meet that saw six All-America honors garnered by Wildcat athletes.

Janet Haskin won a national championship. Connie Teaberry was fourth in the high jump. Clifton go unnoticed.

Etheridge, Steve Fritz and Angie Miller all performed well.

"I'm really happy," Capriotti said. "We had a couple of disappointments, but I thought every one of our kids competed well."

Though Haskin's national-title performance has earned her a great deal of notoriety, it was Teaberry's effort that Capriotti hoped wouldn't

"I thought Connie Teaberry - if it weren't for Janet - may have turned in the performance of the meet for us," he said of Teaberry's showing, which earned her a thirdstraight All-America honor. "For a sophomore, her effort was outstanding.'

Capriotti said the showings of Haskin in particular, and Fritz and Miller in general, made a rather loud statement about what he's trying to do with the Wildcat track program.

"The thing with me is that I'll take competitors from anywhere, but I'd rather get them right here in Kansas," he said of the natives of Onaga, Gypsum and Frankfort. win a Big Eight championship," Ha-"Success with those people proves you can recruit within your own area and compete.

National champ caps solid year with upset win

By David Svoboda Sports Editor

There was no sophomore jinx in 1989-90 for Janet Haskin.

After struggling through an injury-plagued freshman year, the distance runner from Onaga rebounded strongly during her second collegiate year and captured three All-America honors.

The most recent of those All-America showings — her national championship performance in the 10,000 meters at the NCAA outdoor championship last week in Durham, N.C., - was probably the most surprising. Haskin had run but one 10,000 in Runners experienced in the event surrounded her, but it was Haskin who stole the show.

"In a way, I think not having run too many of them (10,000-meter races) helped," Haskin said. "The first time I did it, I really didn't know how to run the race - I was just going out and running.

And that lack of experience may have helped Haskin more than she expected, said coach John Capriotti.

"I think the 10,000 is a race that you can't run that many times in a year," Capriotti said. "The fact that she was still a little tentative or a bit naive in the event probably ended up helping her in the end."

The win lifted Haskin's spirits, expectations, and set a small town into its own private celebration. "A goal of mine was always to skin said. "I never dreamed I'd win a national championship. "It really helped my confidence a lot to be able to compete at the national level and have some success," she said. "A couple of people have asked me now if I'm going to go on to the Olympics. That wasn't even talked about before."

But Haskin has assuredly been talked about in Onaga, her hometown. American flags flew in the windows of businesses along with signs that proclaimed Haskin as "our national champion."

"Our national champion" gave her coach, Capriotti, one of the thrills of his career in track and field.

"For me, as a coach, watching her win was the happiest moment for me since 1978, when I captained the national championship cross country team at Cal Poly that was coached by Steve Miller (now K-State athletic director)," he said.

For Haskin, the thrill wasn't quite as immediate in coming. As Capriotti and her teammates were in the stands yelling and screaming, Haskin was below, gathering her

"Actually, it really didn't start sinking in until a couple of days later," she said. "I saw coach in the stands and everybody jumping up and down, but I had just won a race. Now I know how important the race

Capriotti said Haskin's performance may have been the best in the

"She ran a great race — a perfect race - and she had to," he said. "She had to make sure she was in contention at all times but under control. The race changed so many times that it was just a thrill to watch.

Valvano to be color analyst on ABC college hoop telecasts

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK - The network that aired point-shaving allegations against North Carolina State, leading to the dismissal of Jim Valvano on Monday, hired the former Wolfpack coach as a basketball analyst.

Valvano, who signed a 3-year deal with ABC for a reported $900,000, will team with Brent Musburger on 11 network telecasts next season. He also will work as an analyst for ESPN, owned by ABC's parent company Capital Cities.

It was an ABC News report on Feb. 28 that started a series of events which led to Valvano's ouster at N.C. State. The ABC report alleged that Wolfpack players were involved in point-shaving under Valvano. Those allegations remain under investigation.

But that didn't seem to deter Valvano or ABC. During two conference calls Monday, Valvano accepted responsibility but staunchly denied he was involved in any wrongdoing.

And Dennis Swanson, president of ABC Sports, noted that ABC's News and Sports divisions are separate entities.

"I don't think that any of the stories involved in that incident in any way involve Jim Valvano," Swanson Valvano will team with Musburger, fired by CBS on April 1, the day before he broadcast the NCAA title game. Keith Jackson will continue to team with Dick Vitale, another fasttalking "V" from the New York-area on the network's principal team.

Ironically, Musburger was let go just six days before Valvano settled with N.C. State, where he had coached since 1980 and his team won the '83 national title.

Valvano's ouster followed a series of negotiations after the pointshaving allegations and criticism from faculty members and others about the lack of academic progress by N.C. State players.

Earlier, Valvano had been forced to step down as athletic director after the school was placed on NCAA probation for violations including the sale of tickets and sneakers. "I have never stated that I had no

The 44-year-old Valvano, whose name has been mentioned in connection with both pro and college coaching vacancies, said he had no current plans to forsake his new career.

"Right now I'm excited about this. I want to be the best I can be," he said. "Very few people have their dreams come true. I had my dreams come true with a national championship. I'll be doing the two things I like the best — watching basketball and talking."

As for his ability to handle the job, he said: "I don't have experience at being an analyst, but I don't know any analyst who has as much experience in coaching."

Yankees dismiss Dent

Minor league manager chosen as new field boss

By The Associated Press

BOSTON - Manager Bucky Dent was dismissed by the New York Yankees Wednesday and replaced by Carl "Stump" Merrill, the club's minor-league manager at Columbus, Ohio. Dent's dismissal had been rumored for weeks as the Yankees floundered in last place in the American League East with an 18-31 record.

The move marked the 19th managerial change under owner George Steinbrenner in the last 17 years. Dent replaced Dallas Green on Aug. 18, 1989.

It is Merrill's first major-league managing job. He leaves Columbus in first place in the International League.

Dent was latest in a parade of managers who have attempted to restore the Yankees to their former Merrill becomes the 12th individual to hold the job.

Dent had been promoted from Columbus last summer to replace Green and piloted the club to an 18-22 record that included a ninegame winning streak. On Sept. 8, the last day of the winning streak, he was given a contract to manage for the 1990 season. The team finished fifth with a 74-87 record, 141/2 games behind.

When the Yankees struggled from the start this season and sank into last place with the worst record in baseball, the heat was on Dent. The 18-31 record was the poorest start in 65 years for the club and speculation centered on how long Dent would last, especially after the cross-town New York Mets dismissed manager Davey Johnson last week.

Dent starred for the Yankees at shortstop in the mid 1970s, when the club won three consecutive American League Championships and two straight World Series

'Total Recall' ruins premise with excessive violence, gore

I wish I could forget "Total Recall," Amold Schwarzenegger's futuristic summer gorefest.

Director Paul Verhoeven, of "Robocop" fame, destroys a fascinating sci-fi premise - artificial memory implantation — by creating an interstellar Sam Peckinpah film. What could have been an interesting film plunges quickly into a miasma of violence, harsh language, and special effects overkill.

Schwarzenegger plays Doug Quaid, a construction worker tortured by nighuaares about Mars. Obsessed with these images, Quaid buys a "memory implant" of a spy mission to the red planet.

In this vision of the future, Mars is being ruthlessly mined for "Turbinium," which is desperately needed back on war-torn Earth. It so happens that Mars is war-torn as well -a raggedy band of rebels and mutants are trying to wrest control of the planet from the greedy president Cohaagen, played with Machiavellian visciousness by Ronny Cox.

Quaid's implant goes awry. He is not who he thinks he is - his marriage, his job, his memories are all false. As the fragments of his mind coalesce, it becomes apparent that he has been to Mars before - as an agent for the Turbinium mining corporation who switched to the rebel side. The corporation has had his memory erased.

The ensuing chronicle of Quaid's voyage to Mars to reassemble his memory and save the rebels has plenty of intriguing twists. Unfortudream and reality is gunned down in a hail of bullets.

uses a dead man's body as a shield from his pursuer's bullets. In another, he breaks three necks in 10 seconds. By the movie's end, the bullet hole in the center of the forehead" shot is a tired cliche.

The film at times seems almost calculated to shock and offend. Various scenes depict a dwarf prostitute spraying a barroom with machinegun fire, a man having his arms violently ripped off, the execution of a three-breasted mutant woman and atmospheric pressure ripping the face from the unlucky owner's skull.

A scene in which Cohaagen kicks over a fish tank, leaving gasping goldfish writhing on the floor, caused some theatergoers to walk out. The analogy that Verhoeven was apparently attempting to make that Cohaagen was going to do the same thing to the rebels - was lost on those viewers that remained.

The film is also blatantly sexist. All the female roles are either "bitches" or hookers. Quaid's evil nately, the film's clever blurring of wife sets herself up for a "just dessert" by repeatedly kicking him in the groin. The male-dominated audi-Verhoeven gives new meaning to ence cheered as Schwarzenegger ut-

The movie is filled with other tacky "Make my day" one-liners destined for the promotional trailers. For instance, as Schwarzenegger impales a pursuer with a drill: "Screw you."

Even the viewers that appreciate the movie up to this point will be dismayed by the ridiculous - downright hokey - ending. I recommend avoiding this film, but you might want to catch the ending on videotape for a good laugh.

Verhoeven blends humour and violence in "Total Recall" to set a new standard for state-of-the-art, kill-perminute black comedy. The audience reaction to all the killing was especially frightening, including my own I often found myself laughing at what amounted to bloody camage on the screen. In retrospect, however, it's not funny.

The box-office receipts for "Total Recall" are a sad statement about our society. Perhaps the hyperviolent images in this film are not too far in the distant future after all. Avoid this

Democrats, Republicans prepare for battle

By The Associated Press

Cash-strapped Democrats Dianne Feinstein and Harvey Gantt had little time Wednesday to savor primary victories as they plunged into campaigns against well-financed

The Democratic Party chairman conceded the money advantage but proclaimed issues will prevail in November.

Sen. Pete Wilson, sitting on a $3.5 million campaign war chest after coasting to victory in the Republican primary for governor of California, welcomed Feinstein to the fray and warned that her election night celebration would be the last Democratic victory party of the 1990s.

North Carolina Democrats gave Gantt, the black former mayor of Charlotte, a strong sendoff into a Senate challenge to conservative Republican Jesse Helms. Regarded as the underdog in the Democratic primary runoff, Gantt picked up 57 percent of the vote to roll over prosecutor Mike

"You're talking about a newly awakened voter in North Carolina," said national Democratic Party Chairman Ronald H. Brown. "You're talking about a candidate who has touched some chords there."

While candidates who competed in primaries in nine states celebrated their victories or licked their wounds, much of the post-election attention centered not on a candidate but on voter approval of a California ballot initiative that will double the state gasoline tax over the next five years.

Supporters as well as some opponents of the ballot proposition touted the vote as the end of the tax revolt that began in 1978 when California voters passed Proposition 13 that cut property taxes in half and put a lid on future increases.

'It really does end the tax revolt in California and sends a message to Washington which I dislike intensely," said anti-tax economist Arthur Laffer.

Crisis Center offers training

By Margaret Clarkin Staff Reporter

The Crisis Center Inc. is offering summer training sessions to people interested in becoming volunteers at the center.

Volunteers try to help stop violence by answering hot-line calls, bringing in women who request shelter and assisting in giving presentations to raise public awareness about violence, said Caroline Silva, volunteer coordinator for the center.

The center offers a 24-hour hotline, emotional support, crisis counseling, emergency transportation, shelter and food, Silva said. There is also a battered women and rape support group.

The training sessions are also open to those who do not want to be volunteers.

"It's to help them understand the emotions and issues that arise with domestic violence and sexual assault," Silva said.

She said persons are encouraged to attend the sessions to better understand violence and to learn how to promote nonviolence in the community.

The center covers five counties: Geary, Clay, Marshall, Pottawatomie and Riley, Silva said. Fort Riley is also included.

"We also offer referrals," she said. "We work through the resources available. If someone wants to get a divorce, but they don't have any money, we refer them to the Flint Hills Legal Services."

All services the center offers are free and confidential, Silva said.

Some K-State students volunteer for one semester, and others volunteer for four years, she said. "Ten people have pre-registered," Silva said. "But we never have too many volunteers.'

Silva said domestic violence and other such issues will be covered the first training session while the nuts and bolts of the center will be covered at the second session.

"The third day we will talk about sexual assault - the legal side and working with the police," she said. After going through the training sessions, the volunteers will meet with Silva and discuss their role at the center.

"We want to make sure their skills are used," she said.

Training sessions are available in the summer, fall and winter.

"I was struck by the cycle to the violence," said Linda Bracket, a Manhattan volunteer at the center. "They explain it in training and in working with clients. They describe the cycle through their story.'

Volunteers are nervous when they go into the training, Bracket said. They wonder how they will react in a crisis situation.

"(The sessions) prepare you," she said. "The training will come right back to you. New volunteers have been well prepared when their first call came in.

The first two training sessions will be Saturday and Tuesday at the First Lutheran Church. The last session will be Saturday, June 23 at the First Christian Church.

Paul Gleb, U.S. Department of Education, speaks Monday evening at the Manhattan Emergency Shelter's press conference to begin "Hope for the Homeless" month. Mayor Richard Hayter presented a proclamation to the shelter, now in its fifth year of service.

Mayor asks for greater awareness to homeless problem during June

By Gregory A. Branson Staff Reporter

June was designated as a month of "Hope for the Homeless" Monday during a press conference at the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc.

Manhattan Mayor Richard Hayter read a statement designating the month as one of heightened awareness and praised the emergency shelter for its five years of service in providing aid to Manhattan's homeless.

"The community has a commit-ment to meet," Hayter said. "Manhattan is like one large, extended family, and every member of the community is part of that family. The emergency shelter becomes a home for members of the family." Dennis Angle, president of the emergency shelter's board, said the emergency shelter was started as a University for Man class to provide a place where the less fortunate could get a hot meal and possibly stay overnight.

Richard Friesen, director of UFM, said the UFM staff originally had decided to help the people at the emergency shelter because education is something everyone should have access to. The emergency shelter's board decided that more could be done to help the homeless, Angle said, and classes were offered to people at the emergency shelter wanting to improve their situation. Life skills and literacy classes are among those available.

The emergency shelter usually employs around eight workers, and someone is on-duty at the house 24 hours a day, he said. Angle said the emergency shelter works out of a house owned by the Presbyterian Church. The emergency shelter, a United Way Agency, pays $1 a year for rent.

Last year, the emergency shelter served about 12,000 meals to 480 people - 72 percent of which were Manhattan residents. The emergency shelter charges 25 cents per person a night, and requires them to set goals for themselves.

Paul Gieb, project officer of the adult literacy program for the Department of Education, was a special guest at the event. He is visiting from Washington, D.C., to observe the literacy program at the emergency shelter.

Gieb said Kansas was one of 30 states that has received special awards for its efforts to educate the illiterate.

"The employees are serving the most vulnerable part of our society, and they should be recognized," he

Several local government officials attended the press conference and reception. Those present included state representatives Sheila Hochhauser and Katha Hurt; city commissioner and former mayor Kent Glasscock; and Glenda Humbert, executive director of Riley County United Way.

Club goes abroad

By Monica Marcotte Staff Reporter

Visits to Westminster Abbey and Buckingham Palace were highlights of a recent trip the K-State Finance Club took to London, England.

The trip gave the sixteen students an opportunity to study the economic unification of western Europe. It lasted from May 21-28 and was supervised by Ali Fatemi, associate professor of finance.

Finance centers visited included the International Stock Exchange, and National Westminster Bank — the second largest bank in the world. The students were able to combine business with sight-seeing and witnessed the changing of the guards at Buckingham Palace and a regatta at Oxford University. "Oxford is rather unique because it is spread out all over," said Jennifer Warta, junior in education. "It doesn't look like a regular campus at all. The regatta was packed and Cambridge University was there participating in it also." Warta also saw St. Paul's Cathedral and said it was incredible. "We were there right after a mass and it was so beautiful," she said. "It's hard to describe in words.'

Wes Gaston, sophomore in business, said the currency exchange rate was not what he expected.

"Immediately after I got there, I exchanged $300 in American money and received only 160 British pounds," he said. "If the pound is adjusted to be equal to the dollar in purchasing value, then I ended up losing about $140 in the "Most students used credit cards," he said. "You end up losing a lot less in the exchange process.

A small part of the trip was funded by outside sponsors and the Finance Club helped out by cleaning Bramlage Coliseum this past year, he said.

Gaston said they also visited Lloyd's of Loudon, the insurance company famous for insuring Hollywood stars, and Kensington Park, which is near the home of Prince Charles and Princess Diana of Wales.

Christine Wallace, junior in finance and president of the club, said this was the first major trip the club has taken.

"The trip was a complete success. We hope to start planning for another one next year," Wallace said. "We are thinking about New York City for the next possible

The students received two credit hours and are required to write a paper about the experience and the economic consequences for Europe 1992, she said.

The students agreed that the people they met in London were more than friendly.

"People would walk blocks out of their way to show us directions," Gaston said. "Even the bartender at our hotel took a day off to act as our tour guide to show us around."

One cultural difference the students did not enjoy was the absence of ice cubes in the drinks they ordered.

"Everyone drinks warm pop, warm beer, and you have to ask for water," Warta said. "We're really spoiled over here."

Saline County measles outbreak lessens

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - Saline County officials Wednesday lifted a recommendation that people there avoid large group gatherings, because a statewide measles outbreak appears to be waning.

Del Meier, health educator at the Saline County Health Department, said the last reported case of measles in Salina was May 19. Salina appeared hardest hit by the outbreak, although people in other cities also came down with the measles.

"We don't expect to have any more large outbreaks," Meier said in a telephone interview. She added that County, but those are probably old one or two cases still might appear. cases.

In April, Salina officials urged people in town not to attend large gatherings and that travelers bypass Salina to avoid contact with people who might be carrying the disease.

Across the state, the measles outbreak appears to be declining, state health officials said Wednesday.

The last case reported to the Department of Health and Environment was on May 20 in Johnson County, said KDHE spokesperson Greg Crawford. He said about four cases have been recently reported in Osage

"We would expect to see sporadic cases throughout the state," he said. 'You'll see a smattering of cases. We're not going to see the school exposure.'

So far, about 331 cases have been reported to KDHE this year, and 157 of those were confirmed. The rest are suspected cases but were not confirmed by laboratory tests. Last year, there were 140 confirmed cases of

Crawford said Kansans should continue to make sure children 15 months and older are immunized and to watch for symptoms, which include a high fever, a hacking cough and a red rash. Counties with more than five cases of measles reported are: Butler, eight cases reported, none confirmed; Finney, 32, 17 confirmed; Ford, five, three confirmed; Geary, five, one confirmed; Greenwood, five, none confirmed; Haskell, five, one confirmed; Lyon, five, four confirmed; Montgomery, seven, two confirmed.

Also: Pottawatomie, 35, 31 confirmed; Riley, 42, four confirmed; Sedgwick, 12, five confirmed; and Shawnee, 25, seven confirmed.

South Korean president talks with Bush

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - South Korean President Roh Tae-woo, reporting at the White House on groundbreaking talks with Mikhail Gorbachev, said Wednesday that the Soviet president had agreed to help melt down the ice from the Cold War on the troubled Korean peninsula.

After briefing President Bush, Roh said his talks with Gorbachev definitely will help reduce tensions between North and South Korea and help greatly the process of reunification.

Bush said Roh's meeting with Gorbachev was appropriate and important. If a peace settlement is reached with communist North Korea, Roh told reporters later, talks may be held about further reductions or reallocation of the 40,000 American troops stationed in South Korea.

Roh met with Gorbachev in San Francisco on Monday as the Soviet leader wrapped up a six-day visit in the United States. It was the first high-level encounter between the two nations since Korea was divided after World War II.

The administration hopes that without the unswerving support of Moscow, North Korea will be inclined to seek friendlier ties with South Korea and the industrialized

However, the White House said there was no warming in U.S. ties with North Korea along the lines of improved relations between Seoul and Moscow.

Roh, talking with reporters outside the White House, said he had sought Gorbachev's help in bringing North Korea closer to South Korea.

The South Korean leader said they had agreed that "we have to cooperate so that we can melt down the ice which still exists from the Cold War years."

Asked about prospects for reunification, Roh said North Korea must first open up and embark on a reform

35 dead in Kirghizian riots; gangs overpower authorities

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW - Ethnic violence that has left at least 35 people dead in the republic of Kirghizia spread on Wednesday, with gangs of youths marauding on horseback and authorities reported helpless against rioters.

Anatoly Lukyanov, chairman of the national legislature, told lawmakers on Wednesday that nearly 40 people died in rioting in the Central Asian republic. The official Tass news agency put the death toll at 35, and about 300 have been reported injured in clashes between ethnic Uzbeks and Kirghiz. The unrest, triggered by a land dispute, was the latest in a series of ethnic outbreaks fueled by poverty or political conflict to trouble the government of President Mikhail Gorbachev. The violence in Kirghizia spread on Wednesday to the republic's capital, Frunze, when a rally turned into a riot, and protesters pelted with stones a Communist Party official who tried to speak to the crowd, Tass reported. There are cases of marauding, robbery and violence," it said.

Several Uzbeks were beaten in the Frunze marketplace, and Uzbek students were evacuated from the city's university to a nearby military unit to prevent clashes.

At the rally, speakers called upon the crowd to start pogroms of the Uzbek residents' homes and flats, city Communist Party official Ivan Pavlov said in a telephone interview. He said rioters jumped on a man who looked like an Uzbek and started beating him savagely. In the city of Osh, 75 miles east of Frunze, where the violence broke out Monday night between the two predominantly Moslem ethnic groups, the situation is complicated by numerous groups of Kirghiz youths on horseback converging on the city, the government newspaper Izvestia reported. 'Local organs of power, including the local party committee, have not managed to take control of the situation and are in a state of disarray," it

Police fired on Kirghiz and Uzbeks trying to storm police stations on Tuesday in and around Osh, according to Tass. The city is in the densely populated western part of Kirghizia on the border with Uzbekistan.

Soviet media, including the TV news program "Vremya," Wednesday blamed the violence on widespread unemployment among youth in the region and general poverty. Housing is also critically short in Soviet Central Asia, and the land dispute centered on plots where individual houses could be built.

Lukyanov, speaking to the Supreme Soviet, said: "The difficult process of regulating the conflict is going on." He asked deputies from the republics of Kirghizia and Uzbekistan to appeal for calm.

He said 21 law officers were among the casualties, but did not give a breakdown of dead and injured.

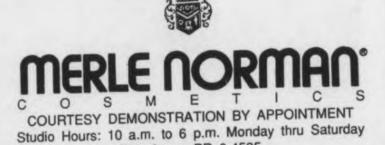

Ethnic Uzbeks from the Fergana Valley of Uzbekistan had arrived in the area to join their comrades in the fight, Lukyanov said, adding that the Soviet Defense Ministry dispatched reinforcements from the republic of Turkmenia to the Osh area. Clashes also were reported in the nearby town of Uzgen, where six deaths and 18 injuries occurred. Police in Frunze also were placed on A duty officer of the Osh police said in a telephone interview that a majority of shops and factories reopened Wednesday after being shut down on Tuesday. He refused to give his name. Tass reported that helicopters hovered over Osh and armored personnel carriers rolled through the streets of the city of 210,000 people. A state of emergency and a 10 p.m.-to-6 a.m. curfew remained in effect in the region.

Hershberger to report to prison

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - Former Wichita oilman Jim Hershberger still must report Monday to a federal prison in Leavenworth, despite his latest attempt to overturn his conviction on 25 fraud-related counts.

Hershberger and his attorney, Michael Holland of Russell, filed documents Tuesday with the U.S. District Court in Topeka to delay the start of Hershberger's term at the minimum-security Federal Prison Camp.

The former millionaire could spend almost 61/2 years there under a sentence imposed by U.S. District Judge Dale Saffels in May. Saffels ordered Hershberger to report to prison by 2 p.m. Monday.

Hershberger contends that his former attorney, Thomas Haney of Topeka, mishandled his defense. He sued the court and the federal Bureau of Prisons, challenging the constitutionality of the convictions.

Holland filed the latest motion with U.S. District Judge Richard Rogers, but Rogers assigned the case Wednesday to Saffels because Saffels presided over Hershberger's trial.

In an interview, Saffels said that if Hershberger attempted to raise the issue of his legal defense in an appeal to the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver, the appeals court most likely would return the case to Saffels. Hershberger has already appealed.

Blasts rock tanker

spilling into gulf

By The Associated Press

GALVESTON, Texas - A series of powerful explosions Sunday aboard the blazing supertanker Mega Borg sent burning crude oil spilling into the water, officials said.

"This is a real big one," said Coast Guard Chief Petty Officer Todd Nelson. "We've got burning crude oil rolling off the stern into the Authorities also said they were concerned that the ship's stern appeared to be listing.

The five explosions came nearly 11/2 days after a blast and fire killed at least two crew members and forced evacuation of the 853-foot-long Norwegian oil tanker in the Gulf of Mexico. They were the latest in a series of smaller explosions that began Saturday afternoon.

Burning crude oil The ship's stern, where the fire was concentrated, has dropped by 58 feet since the first explosion Saturday, indicating either that the cargo had shifted or the Mega Borg was taking on water, Coast Guard Lt. Cmdr. Frank Whipple told a Sunday evening news conference.

> "We're uncertain what that means," Whipple said.

"It's not good," Nelson said. "We don't know the possibility of it sinking. There certainly is a larger chance of the ship sinking than before the explosions. We're still optimistic that the ship and cargo can be saved if there is an effective firefighting operation."

The latest blasts, which began late in the morning and ended about 12:30 p.m., came shortly after members of a salvage team boarded the crippled ship to begin a full-scale assault on the blaze. They were off the ship before the blasts began, and there were no reports of injuries.

Members of the Smit America Galveston Bay Salvage Team, hired by the ship's own-

The ship's stern, where the fire was coners, were able to shut off some valves to the ship's tanks, Whipple told an earlier briefing. A spill about one mile long north of the vessel and one about 20 miles long to the south were visible Sunday evening. Prevailing currents and winds were expected to push the oil towards a 150- to 200-mile stretch of Texas coast between Freeport and Corpus Christi.

Thousands of feet of containment booms were being brought in as a precaution in case a larger spill developed. The tanker, 57 miles southeast of Galveston, held 38 million gallons of light crude oil.

Seventeen of the 41 crew members rescued were injured, none seriously, in Saturday's explosion. Two remained hospitalized Sunday in good condition.

The Coast Guard's Atlantic Strike Team from Mobile, Ala., and other spill response groups brought a high-seas barrier boom and other supplies, including foam, to the ship.

Four Coast Guard cutters were in place around the supertanker Sunday, Whipple said.

Puppy breeders endure criticism

By Margaret Clarkin Staff Reporter

Legitimate commercial breeders across the state of Kansas have faced increased criticism in the wake of negative publicity concerning puppy mills.

Nisha Umbarger, a commercial dog breeder from Chanute, said the publicity is hurting her business.

"Commercial breeders care about their dogs, and they take care of them," Umbarger said. "They do breed for genetics, and they breed for standards." She said puppy mills breed dogs strictly for profit. They try to breed dogs as fast as they can with any other breed available.

'Puppy mills don't take care of their dogs," Umbarger said. "They don't clean the pens. They don't give adequate veterinarian care. They don't feed them well or give them their annual shots.'

The 17 female dogs owned by Umbarger are bred with one of her three male dogs. She raises two separate breeds.

Umbarger sells her dogs to a broker from Missouri, who sells the dogs across the country.

Sales of the puppies have decreased because of bad publicity. Umbarger said her broker has experienced a drop in sales of 50 percent - although sales frequently drop during the summer months.

"I am a commercial breeder and lately, because of that, I am classified as a puppy mill," Umbarger said.

Californians Against Puppy Mills has received extensive publicity in its protest of Kansas-bred puppies.

In an article in the Topeka Capital-Journal, Ellen Katzman, CAPM member, said she thinks the puppy-breeding industry in Kansas has not been adequately monitored.

Umbarger said she has a state and federal license for commercial breeding. She said she doesn't like to pay two fees, but said she thinks it is important to be inspected twice by two separate organizations. Both inspections are unannounced.

At the federal level, the U.S. Department of Agriculture has problems in enforcing the inspections, Umberger said. "They have no teeth," she said. "(The inspectors) can come in, and if someone has a gun and says, 'Get back in your truck. I'm not showing you my kennel,' all (the inspectors) can do is get back in their truck and leave."

Umbarger said with red tape and paper work, it could take three to four years to get a conviction against puppy mills.

The state has teeth to close someone down," she said. "With the USDA and the state working together, they can close people down,"

Umbarger said she started in the breeding industry because she thought it might be a way to make extra money. But in the four years Umbarger has been a breeder, she hasn't seen any profit.

During a Thursday afternoon news conference at Kansas Lottery headquarters, Frahm, a 51-year-old construction worker from Burchard, Neb., calmly gave short answers to the roomful of reporters.

working?

Frahm: Probably won't have time. Earlier Thursday, Frahm stepped forward to claim the third largest prize awarded by Lotto America. Kansas Lottery Executive Director Gerald Simpson said Frahm's jackpot was also the second largest individual prize awarded by Lotto America.

Frahm won the prize after buying $5 worth of Lotto America tickets at a north Topeka convenience store earlier in the week. Frahm works for Rinner Construction of Topeka, and drives 110 miles each day to work.

As the news conference ended, Frahm gave interviews to area radio stations and posed for photographers. Frahm's wife, Clarabelle, stood holding a bouquet of roses and answered questions. "I'm still in shock," Clarabelle Clarabelle Frahm said she has criticized her husband for buying lottery tickets.

"We're both from big families," she said. "We both work hard for what we've got. It's my religious background, I just don't believe in gambling.

Edwin Frahm said his wife's criticism would probably stop.

"I don't think there is anything wrong with a man spending $4 to $5 a week, because if that puts you in poverty, you're already there." he said.

Edwin Frahm plans to use his winnings to raise Belgian horses, and to do "a little farming. The kinds of things a fellow thinks about doing."

LAGOS, Nigeria (AP) - The military government reportedly has shut down two more newspapers in its crackdown on opposition following an abortive coup.

Employees of the two papers said state security agents arrived at the Vanguard and Champion newspapers Saturday, ransacked offices, seized documents and detained some editors and administrative personnel.

On Friday, President Ibrahim Babangida's government closed New Breed magazine, which had published a letter written by one of the alleged coup plotters who remains at large.

Immediately after the April 22 coup attempt, authorities closed several newspapers and detained several journalists. Some of the reporters remain in detention without charge. Several lay leaders of Christian organizations and university professors also have been detained.

Pilot sucked through window

LONDON (AP) - A British Airways captain was sucked partway through a windshield that blew out at 24,000 feet on Sunday, but crew members managed to cling to him while the co-pilot made an emergency landing, the airline said.

The pilot, Tim Lancaster, was hospitalized with serious injuries but was expected to survive, authorities said. Police said eight passengers were treated for shock.

"I could see a body hanging out of the window with two men and a woman hanging on to his legs. They were trying to stop him from being sucked out," said passenger Margaret Simmonds.

The incident occurred as the British-built twin-engine BAEC 111, carrying 81 passengers and six crew members, was en route from Birmingham, England, to Malaga, Spain.

A British Airways spokesman, speaking anonymously in keeping with British custom, said a steward was in the foward galley when he heard a loud bang and saw Lancaster being pulled from his cockpit seat.

But he managed to grab the pilot's legs. A second steward rushed to his assistance "and they held onto him," the spokesman said.

Rappers arrested for lyrics

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. (AP) - A rap group kept its promise to sing lyrics from an album ruled obscene and authorities kept their word, arresting two members of 2 Live Crew on Sunday after an adults-only concert.

The early-morning arrests came four days after a federal judge declared obscene the Miami group's album "As Nasty As They Wanna Be," and two days after a local record dealer was arrested for selling the popular recording.

Broward County sheriff's deputies arrested 2 Live Crew leader Luther Campbell, 29, and singer Chris Wongwon, 26, shortly after the show at a Hollywood nightclub.

"The deputies let them get a couple of blocks away from the club and then they pulled the limousine over," said sheriff's spokesman Al Gordon.

Only Campbell and Wongwon were taken because the group split up after the performance, heading in different directions in three vehicles, Gordon said.

About 750,000 fliers were to be distributed to churches statewide during the weekend, said Mary Kay Culp, executive director of Missouri Citizens for Life-Western Region. ### Farm bill to be done this week

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Members of the House Agriculture Committee plan to finish their work on the 1990 farm bill this week, while their counterparts in the Senate engage in open warfare over commodity prices.

The last big issue in the House committee is the conservation section of the bill, which Chairman Kika de la Garza, D-Texas, said would be completed Tuesday.

That's the day the Senate committee is to go public with its arguments over price supports, something the members have avoided in all their other work on the bill that sets agriculture policy for the next five years.

Most problems with other sections have been resolved in closed meetings between the Democratic and Republican staffs.

When the staffs couldn't resolve the commodity price support problems, committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., appointed a "working group" of himself, Sens. Bob Kerrey, D-Neb., David Pryor, D-Ark., Richard Lugar, R-Ind., Bob Dole, R-Kan., and Thad Cochran, R-Miss.

When the group couldn't resolve the problems, the chairman decided to go to open session and settle the matter through voting.

"I think we will end up getting a bill reported out," Kerrey said last Friday. "It won't be what Lugar wants. It won't be exactly what I want."

Kerrey took the lead among the Democrats in the committee who proposed increasing price supports 1 percent in 1991 and allowing other increases in the four subsequent years based on inflation rates.

Lugar's proposal represented the Bush administration's position that price supports should be frozen at 1990 levels.

Kerrey said his proposal would cost $13 billion in 1991. "We only got $10.6 billion from the Budget Committee," he said.

He said, however, that Leahy had told him he wouldn't take a bill to the full committee unless it had support of all the Democrats on the panel, was within the budget and could bring in some of the Republicans. "I think we have every disagreement settled except for the loan rates," said Kerrey. Lugar told reporters early last week that he would not accept anything other than a freeze in target prices and loan rates. He said if Democrats wanted to make an issue of it, they would find themselves in a floor battle that could lead to a oneyear extension of current law.

"The administration wants a one-year extension," said Kerrey.

Agriculture Secretary Clayton Yeutter has said repeatedly that an extension would be acceptable because international trade talks known as GATT, to be completed in December, could create a need for a change in support policies anyway.

In a session with reporters last Friday, Rep. Charles Stenholm, D-Texas, a subcommittee chairman on the House Agriculture Committee, pointed out some problems with an extension.

"Why would you want to go through the same debate twice within a 12-month period," he said. 'There's no such thing as a simple one-year extension when you are dealing with the quirks in the law and the budget summit.'

High school students came from across Kansas to represent their communities in a choral performance Saturday at All Faiths Chapel.

More than 200 high school students auditioned to receive a scholarship entitling them to be a part of this program. Of these students, 42 were chosen as finalists to represent about 26 Kansas communities, said Rod Walker, director of the Summer Choral Institute.

The 45-minute concert consisted of a mixed chorus, two madrigal ensembles and four soloists.

Walker said that for 12 summers, K-State and the Master Teacher Institute for the Arts have sponsored scholarships for high who have a thirst for music. There are two benefits that come from the program. "The first provides an accelerated experience in (music), and the second is a recruitment thing,"

Walker said.

If the first part of the program is successful, the second usually follows, Walker said. He said he estimated 42 percent of the institute participants to be prospective K-State students. The finalists spent the last four days on campus learning advanced with Walker. "The quality (of the students) gets better each year," Walker said. He said this year's group was both motivated and intelligent. The choral, vocal and leadership skills school sophomores and juniors average grade point average of the entire group was a 3.4, and four or five students carried a 4.0 GPA.

> As the singers left with their families, each seemed pleased as they thanked Walker for the experience.

Dimitra Hillman, Manhattan, said she felt the importance of being a leader to gain the respect of

She said she learned from Walker and the experience that people with the best attitudes can make the difference.

"Everything just came together," said Mollie Massieon, from Warnego and a second-year institute participant.

Massieon said she enjoyed her stay at the University and her experiences with the choir.

Animal rights activists rally

Stars protest

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Thousands of animal rights activists including celebrities Christopher Reeve and Grace Slick rallied in the nation's capital Sunday seeking to promote the humane treatment of animals in the wild, on farms and in research laboratories.

Many marchers advocated an end to the use of animals in medical research, a goal that top health officials say is misguided and could end advances in medical research.

U.S. Capitol Police estimated 24,000 people attended a rally on the steps of the Capitol following the one-mile march down Pennsylvania Avenue under sunny skies. But organizers claimed more than 50,000 people from around the country showed up.

"Darling, this is so dazzling for me it's breathtaking," said actress Gretchen Wyler as she gazed at the sea of people outside the domed Capitol. Wyler, who has starred on Broadway and in television shows, has been active in the animal movement for 22 years.

Marchers chanted "Animal Rights - Now." Many carried banners and placards with pictures and slogans saying things such as "Animals Are Not for Wearing." "Fur Is Dead," and "Animals Have Rights, Too." Some even brought their dogs.

Organizers said "March for the Animals" - the first event of its kind was a milestone in a movement they said was once viewed as outside the mainstream. The march attracted celebrities such as Reeve, the "Superman" of the movies; Slick, used in tests.

once the leader singer of the Jefferson Starship group; and "Days of Our Lives" TV actress Peggy McCay.

"I'm for all angles of animal rights," Slick said. Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., head of the informal Congressional Friends of Animals group, said he opposes the "unnecessary, duplicative and cruel use of animals in medical and other areas." There is no question we are making progress" in popularizing animal rights, said Tom Regan, a professor of philosophy at North Carolina State University, and author of a book, The Case for Animal Rights."

Regan, a vegetarian, describes the animal rights as a "lifestyle movement.

The event attracted animal supporters from all sides of the spectrum, said Peter Linck of the National Alliance for Animal Legislation. They ranged from those who wanted the protection of species such as elephants to those seeking to end medical testing on animals.

Many were seeking changes in the way animals are raised for slaughter as well as the banning of fur clothes.

Health officials are particularly sensitive about efforts to end animal testing, a move they say could be disastrous for medical science.

Health and Human Services Secretary Louis Sullivan has criticized animal rights advocates who use violence and intimidation to block testing of animals. "They are on the wrong side of morality," he said last

Sullivan said some of the greatest advances in medicine, such as the cure for polio, never would have been achieved had animals not been

Political unknown wins Peruvian election

By The Associated Press

LIMA, Peru — Alberto Fujimori, a political unknown four months ago, defeated celebrated novelist Mario Vargas Llosa in a presidential runoff Sunday and promised to improve the economy in the bankrupt nation.

Vargas Llosa conceded defeat. He wished Fujimori success in trying to turn the country around and fight drug trafficking and a decade-old guerrilla insurgency.

Voting took place despite a wave of attacks in one Andean region by Maoist guerrillas who had vowed to sabotage the balloting. At least one voter was killed.

Unofficial vote projections gave Fujimori, 51, an agricultural engineer and former university rector, a six-to-10 point lead.

The projections "give us over-whelming support," Fujimori said at a news conference two hours after polls closed. He invited all political parties to participate in his government in areas where agreements could be reached.

Fujimori said his government would stress economic development over military and police repression as the best way to fight both leftist subversion and cocaine trafficking.

He did not indicate where the money would come from for economic development. The Peruvian treasury is running a $100 million current deficit, and the nation has a $20 billion foreign debt.

Before 1,000 supporters outside his campaign headquarters, Vargas Llosa conceded, wishing Fujimori "success in the difficult responsibility the Peruvian people have placed "Respectful of democratic traditions, I accept the decision of the Peruvian people.'

Vargas Llosa's chief political aide, Alfredo Barnecha, called it a

'It has not been a vote for a political program but a vote to stop Mario Vargas Llosa," Barnechea said after the televised projections were Fujimori, an agricultural engineer and the son of Japanese immigrants, was vying with the center-right Vargas Llosa to replace populist Alan Garcia, whose five-year term ends July 28. Garcia, leader of the Aprista Party, is ineligible to serve a consecutive term.

The election comes as Peru is weathering its worst economic crisis of the century. The impoverished Andean nation also is being bloodied by a savage, decade-long leftist insurgency that has claimed nearly 20,000 lives.

The independent polling firm Apoyo gave Fujimori 49.7 percent of the vote to 39.8 percent for Vargas Llosa. Apoyo said its projections, based on 80 percent of the national vote, showed 10.5 percent blank or void ballots.

POP, another independent polling firm, gave Fujimori 49 percent to Vargas Llosa's 42.1 percent. POP said 8.9 percent of the ballots were blank or void.

The projections were based on exit polls. Both firms said their surveys had a 3 percent margin of error.

The polls closed at 3 p.m. local time (3 p.m. CDT). Official returns were not expected for at least three weeks because of poor communication with mountain and jungle regions.

Nearly 10 million Peruvians are registered to vote, and the law requires them to cast ballots. Unofficial results were expected Sunday As the polls opened Sunday morning, armored helicopters crisscrossed Lima's sunny skies. Tanks and troop carriers patrolled the streets of the capital, home to a third of Peru's 22 million people.

The Shining Path guerrillas, a Maoist group, bombed a polling station and killed at least one voter in Huancayo, a rebel stronghold in the Andes mountains east of Lima, reporters there said.

Guerrillas exploded at least nine other bombs in the city 120 miles east of Lima, police said.

Four dead men with gunshot wounds were brought into the city morgue in Huancayo. Police said they had no information on who killed them.

Guerrillas also exploded dynamite charges at six other locations in Huancayo. No one was reported hurt in the other attacks, but rebel threats crippled transportation in three other mountain cities. Vargas Llosa, 54, ran on a freemarket platform. He pledged harsh austerity measures to revive Peru's moribund economy and ease hyperinflation, running at 2,000 percent annually.

Fujimori, is an independent like Vargas Llosa. He called for food subsidies and price controls and attacked Vargas Llosa's proposal for an economic "shock program".

Morality Police seek to limit speech

t's going to be an active summer for the Morality Police. Already, they're out there in full force lobbying to eliminate the National Endowment for the Arts, fighting to label more rock and rap records and targeting congressional candidates who don't hold the appropriate "family" values. Preserving the upstanding moral fiber of this country is hard work, especially in an election year.

For the most part, the Morality Police are ultra-conservatives and proud of it. Members of the Morality Police, like Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., want to tell people what to think. The Morality Police have no problem clobbering the First Amendment if it means protecting their version of America — an America free of deviants and perverts out to twist the minds of decent, morally righteous individuals.

There's a world full of evil out there, and these groups aim to stop it. It's for America's own good, really. "Just look at the Mapplethorpe exhibit," cried Helms and his wife this spring in a Senate hearing. "You start off looking at all these nice portraits of famous movie stars and authors and then you get to this bunch of photos of men doing the most undescribable things to one another with rubber hoses. We couldn't believe our eyes, so of course we had to keep looking. We bought these postcard-size prints of the worst ones. We thought we might pass them around ... "

Because Mapplethorpe is already dead, the Morality Police needed to find someone or something else to serve as an example of immorality. They chose to make things very difficult for the federal organization that gave funds to some of the museums that showed the exhibit, the NEA. In a flash of genius, some particularly upright members of Congress decided that cutting the NEA's funding was the appropriate way to protect America from future obscenity.

Never mind that the majority of the NEA's $171 million annual budget is distributed in the form of grants to community arts associations. Places like Salina don't really need a civic orchestra. Russell doesn't need an arts council. This is a war to defend the decency of our society and some groups are just going to have to make sacrifices for the good of the country. If not, the Mapplethorpe exhibit might come to your town next.

We, the American people, will someday thank Helms and the American Family Association of Tupelo, Miss., for saving us from corruption.

Another person who should be on every Americans list for a thank you note is Tipper Gore. As the founder of the Parents' Music Resource Center, Gore has scored one coup after another in the war on explicit rock lyrics.

A couple of weeks ago, the Recording Industry Association of America unveiled a standardized label for records with explicit lyrics. Although labeling is voluntary and does not offer any guidelines restricting the purchase of the records, some record stores will not sell labeled records to minors. Other record stores will not stock any labeled

According to an article in the May 31 issue of Rolling Stone magazine, "it's easier for record stores to institute an eighteen-or-over policy than to take the best."

or the most part, the heat is coming at the state level. Record store owners in Alabama and Florida have been taken to court for selling labeled records to minors. State legislators in Tennessee, Pennsylvania and Missouri have proposed laws mandating labeling.

It's easier just to go along with the labeling for now and hope the issue will fade away in a few years. The alternative is to bring back Pat Boone and his homogenized versions of rhythm and blues songs by black artists. Just imagine what sort of innovation the New Kids on the Block might bring to "Gosh Darn, Those Police," a sanitized version of the rap song "Fuck the Police" by NWA.

The Morality Police say they love the Constitution because it is the embodiment of the democratic values that make this country great. Without pausing to take a breath, they'll tell you in three words what's wrong with this sacred document they hold so dear — the First Amendment. In a nutshell, their argument is "freedom of expression is a problem because it allows people to voice ideas we don't like."

But each Morality Police success erodes the First Amendment. They have the right to call anything they want obscene or a threat to society. That's a form of expression. They can protest, boycott, mass mail and lobby as much as they want as guaranteed by the Constitution.

The actual damage to the First Amendment occurs when legislators, store owners, record companies and art museums give into these demands. By refusing to support the work of artists, musicians and writers, they are the ones guilty of censorship. The industry turns on itself and begins a much more thorough job of limiting expression than any law imaginable. Writers may go unpublished if there's even the slightest chance their work might offend someone. Musicians may think twice about performing songs with certain lyrics or about certain subjects out of fear their records will be boycotted. Art galleries will limit their displays to safe works depicting sunsets, puppies and circus clowns.

The First Amendment allows free expression, including expression that others may find controversial. In some ways, the ideas expressed by the Morality Police are just as offensive as what they criticize. They imply that the United States needs a guardian to protect democracy. What they fail to understand is that democracy is protecting them and anyone else in this country with an idea in his head.

Stop revolving door on minority retention

Too little, too late.

Such may be a description of the administration's actions to halt the revolving door minority faculty and administrators seem to pass through at K-State.

All-out efforts are made to bring minority staff to the University, but little is done after arrival to facilitate and ensure their stay on Recent grumblings of dissatisfaction by some among minority administrators and faculty have shed new light on the problem. Citing reasons that range from better job offers elsewhere to the lack of peer identity in the Manhattan area, six minority faculty members have opted to leave K-State.

Few people obtain an education to the terminal degree level. Minorities who do are in high demand at universities across the nation. The administration works hard to get these minorities to come to K-State. It should now take every measure to make minority faculty and administrators remain.

These departures harm everyone associated with the University. Minority students are put in a difficult situation. Positive role models are hard to come by — now there are even fewer available. It also hurts the student majority and other faculty by robbing them of an opportunity to experience multi-cultural diversity.

The administration now recognizes these problems and, in recent months, has implemented programs to increase minority student enrollment. The position of assistant vice provost for minority affairs has been created for the purpose of minority leadership.

When Mordean Taylor-Archer assumes that post later in the summer, she will have a rare chance to make a difference on our campus—to stop that revolving door once and for all.

Taylor-Archer should be given full support by the administration and total freedom in her implementation of programs to encourage multi-cultural diversity at the University.

Answers to whether the University administration took action in time to alleviate the problem may be a long time in coming.

Let's just hope it isn't too little,

System failing abused children

SRS faces neglect charges

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — The Kansas agency to protect neglected and abused children leaves many of them in dangerous and sometimes fatal situations, according to a newspaper's

The Wichita Eagle reported Sunday that the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services ignored many cases because of poor funding and bad management.

The newspaper interviewed more than 100 social workers, medical professionals, lawyers, foster parents and volunteers.

It said the agency's social workers routinely falsify records, weed out abuse reports and ignore cases.

"My impression is that there are children being left in very dangerous situations. I don't think it's because the individual worker wants it that way," said Janet Roberts, who worked for SRS from its inception in 1973 until 1987.

The American Civil Liberties Union filed suit against SRS in Shawnee County District Court in February. The ACLU claims the agency's Youth Services division fails to protect children, puts them in inappropriate placements, fails to develop case plans and overworks its staff. The SRS says it is not properly financed by the Legislature. "It is amazing in Kansas that we're able to take care of kids as well as we do," said former SRS Secretary Winston Barton, who has left to work for the Oklahoma Department of Human

The newspaper gave examples of children who were lost in the system:

■ Johnathan Reynolds, 10 months, of Goddard, died in August 1988 of malnutrition and neglect. SRS had received a neglect report on him but never responded.

Charlie Walker, 3, of Topeka, died in November 1988 after a severe beating that ruptured his liver. SRS workers had chosen to leave the boy in his home, alwough he had been taken to a doctor earlier on the day he died with burns and a gaping wound on his forehead. ■ Jeremy Parker, 3, of Girard, died in June 1988 from a severe blow to his abdomen. He was in SRS custody at the time, and his attacker was another foster child. Kansans are not outraged about failing child-protection services, said state Rep. Joan Wagnon, D-Topeka. Without outrage, there will be no pressure to make the system change,

"The system doesn't work," she said, "because, basically, we're willing to tolerate a few dead kids." Former state social workers told the newspaper that social workers face pressure to dismiss reports and to lie about how promptly they start investigations.

In 1988, the state average reached an all-time high of 92 cases per worker. SRS has since hired a few more social workers and taken on fewer cases. The average is now 72. National welfare organizations recommend that workers handle no more than 20 to 25 cases at any time.

Sheila McDonald, who worked nine years for SRS before leaving in 1986, said workers were pressured to make agency statistics look good despite what was happening with the

"The response time (for investigations) - a lot of times we didn't meet it. We were told by supervisors that we had to put on it (the report) that we met response times so area directors wouldn't get in trouble," she

McDonald said she argued that the field offices should be honest so that SRS officials and the Legislature would see workers could not do their jobs without more money and staff.

Instead, she said, the Wichita-area office where she worked appeared so efficient as a result of falsified statistics that the state decreased its staff.

Many former workers said they began to look for reasons to dismiss reports. The "intake" workers would weed out many neglect calls and discredit abuse calls unless whoever called had evidence to back up the suspicions.

The high turnover of caseworkers is another problem. About onefourth of SRS social work staff has turned over each of the past three years. The agency employs more than 300 social workers.

For example, while a Wyandotte County child was in Coffeyville, foster parents tried to call but kept finding new social workers on the case. In one case involving six Topeka siblings, a new social worker has been assigned nearly every six months since 1978, the Eagle said.

Doctors and teachers, required by law to report suspected abuse or neglect, said they felt the burden of proving their suspicions shift to them.

'Nine to 10 years ago, the rule of thumb was if a child verbalized dangers ... it was enough a student had brought it up that they would respond within a reasonable length of time," said Preston Williams, a Topeka school social worker.

"In the last three to five years, (SRS has) almost put the reporter in the position of not only having to report but having to confirm cases of abuse or neglect," Williams said.

Social workers assigned to family services have less than 30 minutes a week on average to spend on each

"I had something like 80 cases," McDonald said. "The only way I could manage my caseload was to tend to the ones that were most serious, in a crisis."

Electric Boys' music short circuits

Don't bother to plug this one in. 'Funk-O-Metal Carpet Ride," the debut album from Sweden's Electric Boys, produces a fairly weak current. As rock'n'roll enters the 1990s, there seems to be a wave of new bands that attempt to produce a hybrid of classic and modern rock sensibilities. Bands like King's X and the Masters of Reality manage to draw on classic rock roots without sacrificing originality. Others, like Kingdom Come, are so derivative they are quickly lost in a sea of 1970s soundalikes.

In that sense, the Electric Boys are barely treading water. "Funk-O-Metal Carpet Ride" takes derivation to the extreme - the end result sounds like an awkward combination of yesterday's Beatles, Jimi Hendrix and Led Zeppelin with today's Red Hot Chili Peppers, The Cult and Def Leppard.
The album sounds like a 1960s and 1970s rock potpourri: anyone with the slightest knowledge of music cannot listen to this album without hearing other artists. "The Change" sports a riff stolen from 'Rain" by the Beatles. "If I Had a Car" sounds like a Prince cover of "I Am So Into You" by the Atlanta Rhythm Section. Listeners might feel an odd sense of deja vu when they catch themselves humming along with songs they've never heard before.

Review

Conny Bloom's lead vocals are vaguely reminiscent of Aerosmith's Steve Tyler. If that wasn't enough, his guitar riff on "Electrified" is a twisted version of Aerosmith's "Walk This Way."

Even the liner notes seem to have taken a page from the Bay City

Rollers — the self-proclaimed "next Beatles" of the mid-'70s calling the album a "...journey through driving grooves and rocking rhythms that are sure to stand the test of time and set the standard for others to follow." Let's let the listeners be the judge of that, OK,

For a band that is so blatantly derivative, the Electric Boys show a shocking lack of musical knowledge. A sample of Bloom's blatherings from the same liner notes: "We were the first band to mix sitar, psychedelia, funk and Ever hear a tune called "Behind the Sun" by the Red Hot Chili Peppers a few years back, Conny? It's one thing to rip off other artists, but get your facts straight!

The album does have its moments — the musicianship is quite good. Lead guitarist Franco Santunione is a shredder in the finest Hendrix/Page tradition. Again, the problem is that he's too Heridrix mutated guitar passages from Hendrix's "Little Wing" can be found throughout the album. Even the strongest cut, "Captain of My Soul," is a rehash of "Rock Me Baby" by Hendrix. Why listen to the imitation when one can listen to the real thing?

Which brings us to the crux of the whole matter: original new music must be promoted - instead of recycled pap from the Electric Boys - for the music industry to thrive in the '90s and beyond. This requires taking chances that the record industry is unwilling to take. But taking chances is what rock'n'roll is all about, isn't it?

The Electric Boys are unable or unwilling to take such chances and should be condemned to life as a bar band — doing covers of all the songs they've unceremoniously ripped off.

Foreigners try to leave Liberian capital; airport jammed despite peace talk plans

By The Associated Press

MONROVIA, Liberia - The capital's small airport was overrun by hundreds of foreigners trying to leave on evacuation flights Sunday, despite plans for peace talks.

Monrovia was quiet, and since Friday there had been no reports of major fighting in the 5-month-old war that has engulfed Liberia, leaving more than 1,000 dead.

On Saturday, the rebels, led by Charles Taylor, and the government, led by President Samuel K. Doe, agreed to send delegations to peace talks at the U.S. Embassy in Freetown, in neighboring Sierra Leone. The Liberian Council of Churches will mediate the meetings, which begin today.

Despite the relative calm, however, hundreds of people swamped Monrovia's small Spriggs Payne Airfield airport trying to leave. The main international airport has been closed for a week because of the fighting.

The United States arranged to fly 362 people aboard three chartered Air Guinea flights to Ivory Coast's capital, Abidjan, and then to Charleston, S.C.

"It is better if she leaves. If I have to run for my life I can't run with her," said Rosalind Towe as she put her 3-year-old daughter, Zanwhea, on the plane. Although the child is American, Towe is Liberian and could not board the plane. Two Ghana Airways flights picked up 380 nationals.

Liberian troops pushed and shoved in desperate bids to get their families on a government transport plane that was to fly dependents to a safer part of the country.

Although the fighting has subsided, a siege mentality has grown among Liberian residents. Many say they fear marauding government troops as much as an attack by rebels, who last week battled soldiers 35 miles by road from the capital.

The rebels now maintain control of most of this West African nation of 2.5 million people.

The number of boarded-up shops, lines of people at banks and emptying supermarket shelves indicate the fear in Monrovia. Most shops close in the early afternoon, and the few taxis left in the capital are in high

Most streets are deserted by dusk. On streets where a cacophany of reggae, disco and African pop music used to be heard, solemn hymns now spill from shops

"What can we do but pray? Only God can help us now," said one man.

On Sunday, workers welded heavy metal doors over the grills of a general store, hoping to protect against any looting.

In the city's exclusive Mamba Point neighborhood, on a hill overlooking the Atlantic Ocean, workmen unrolled coils of barbed wire atop walls of the Italian and French warships carrying 2,100 Marines sit. off the coast in case remaining foreigners have to be evacuated by sea or it becomes necessary to guard foreign installations against looters.

Two British frigates and four U.S.

Government forces have been accused of killing hundreds of members of the Gio and Mano tribes, which have backed the rebels since they invaded from Ivory Coast on Dec. 24. The insurgents have been charged with killing many Krahn and Mandingo people, considered loyal to Doe, in revenge.

Seles, Gomez win titles at French Open

Graf drops straight-set match to 16-year-old Agassi fails to unleash power in final round

By The Associated Press

PARIS - Steffi Graf, the topseed, failed to convert four set points in a first-set tiebreaker and No. 2 Monica Seles seized the opening, clawing back for a 7-6 (8-6), 6-4 victory in the French Open women's final Saturday.

In capturing her first Grand Slam title, Seles, 16, destroyed another age barrier, becoming the youngest player - man or woman - to win the clay-court tournament. She is a year younger than Arantxa Sanchez-Vicario, who was 17 when she beat Graf for the title last year.

"It's incredible," said Seles, a native of Yugoslavia. "It's so great to be the youngest one to do it. I'm surthis year. Maybe make the finals, but priati and more. not win it."

Seles did more than set an age milestone. She confirmed herself as the dominant player in women's tennis, winning her sixth straight tournament and 32nd consecutive match, including two in a row over Graf.

While Graf turns 21 next week, another teen prodigy is moving up the ranks - 14-year-old Jennifer Capriati, who lost to Seles in the semifinals.

PARIS - Andres Gomez took the thunder out of Andre Agassi's game and served up his own firepower Sunday to win the French Open men's title and end 10 years of Grand Slam frustration.

Combining a soft touch with raw power, scoring at will with a big first serve and winning most of the crucial points, the 30-year-old Ecuadoran beat Agassi 6-3, 2-6, 6-4, 6-4 for his first Grand Slam championship.

"I've always been dreaming of this moment," said the fourth-seeded Gomez, who had never advanced past the quarterfinals in nine previous French Opens. "It's just been too

The 20-year-old Agassi, seeded third and playing in his first Grand Slam final, couldn't sustain the allout baseline attacking style that had carried him throughout the two-week tournament.

"I didn't think power was necessarily the way to go today," he said. "The big problem today was I could never get him down. He always had the edge. If I just could have gotten a game ahead. I think it could have been different."

Agassi did have his chances. After winning the second set to even the match, he squandered two points that could have put him up 5-4 in the third. In the fourth set, he lost a break point that would have brought him back to 4-4. Each time, Gomez picked up his game and closed out the sets.

Gomez served 10 aces and went to the net 44 times and won 31 of those points, while Agassi had one ace and went to the net 10 times for nine winning points. Gomez piled up 58 winners and 72 unforced errors, compared to 24 and 27 for Agassi.

Pistons win, grab 2-1 lead in series

By The Associated Press

PORTLAND, Ore. - The Detroit Pistons bucked the weight of history and Blazermania Sunday for a 121-106 victory and a 2-1 lead in the NBA Finals.

Joe Dumars scored 33 points and Vinnie Johnson broke out of an abysmal shooting slump with 21 as the Pistons snapped a 16-year, 20-game losing streak in Portland and the Trail Blazers' nine-game playoff winning streak.

The Pistons, stung by Portland's 106-105 overtime victory on Thursday - and playing without starting forward Dennis Rodman, who sprained an ankle - recaptured the coveted homecourt advantage with Sunday's performance.

It was the first time in the playoffs that Detroit won while allowing more than 100 points. The Pistons were 0-5 when the opposition broke the century mark.

Johnson scored 15 points in the second quarter, lifting the Pistons to a seven-point halftime lead.

Dumars then scored 13 in the third margin into the final 12 minutes. Detroit led 86-71 with 2:30 left, but Jerome Kersey, who scored 14 of his 27 points in the period, led an 11-4 run with six in the last 2:21.

The Trail Blazers then missed their first five shots and turned the ball over three times in the first 3:30 of the fourth quarter, enabling the Pistons to start the period with an 8-0 run for a 98-82 lead.

The closest Portland got after that was 109-98 with 3:15 left.

Clyde Drexler added 24 points and Terry Porter 20 for the Trail Blazers, while Isiah Thomas scored 21 for the Portland, which snapped Detroit's 10-game playoff winning streak at home on Thursday, won its first nine postseason appearances at Memorial Coliseum, which has been sold out for 579 consecutive games.

Two more games — on Tuesday and Thursday nights - will be played in Portland, but even if the Trail Blazers win both, Detroit would still have a chance to go back to Auburn Hills, Mich., for a shot at period as the Pistons took a 90-82 repeating as NBA champions.

Athletics sweep K.C.

By The Associated Press

OAKLAND, Calif. - Bob Welch settled down after a shaky start to win his sixth straight decision and the Oakland Athletics completed a threegame sweep, beating Kansas City 3-2 Sunday and sending the Royals to their sixth consecutive loss.

The last-place Royals matched their longest losing streak of the season and fell 16 games behind the American League West-leading Athletics. Oakland won for the fifth time in six games and improved to 38-17, the best record in baseball.

The Athletics again played with star Jose Canseco. He is out of the lineup with a disc problem that is causing back pain, and Athletics team doctor Allan Pont said Sunday that he could not predict when Canseco will return. Welch (9-2) tied teammate Dave Stewart for the second-highest victory total in the league, one behind Roger Clemens. Welch gave up two runs on four hits in the first inning, but then shut out the Royals on three hits until Dennis Eckersley relieved with two outs in the eighth.

Eckersley gave up a single to Kevin Seitzer that loaded the bases before Rey Palacios struck out. Palacios also fanned to end the first

Czechs down U.S., 5-1

FLORENCE, Italy (AP) - The United States learned exactly how far behind the rest of the soccer world it is on Sunday, losing to Czechoslovakia 5-1 in America's first World Cup game in 40 years.

Czechoslovakia, a mid-level European team, dominated for the first 60 minutes and could have scored more but for a few breaks and some excellent saves of Tony Meola, who stopped Michal Bilek's penalty kick with two minutes left.

But Meola also failed on some other shots and got little help from his defense.

Tomas Skuhravy scored twice and Bilek, Ivan Hasek and Milan Luhovy once each for the Czechoslovaks, who led 3-0 before Paul Caligiuri scored for the Americans in the 61st minute.

U.S. midfielder Eric Wynalda was thrown out of the game for committing a foul when play was stopped seven minutes into the second half, meaning the United States had to play the final 38 minutes a man short.

Stadium party ban possible

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) - The Kansas City Royals are considering a ban on tailgate parties, replacing them with a sheltered area where baseball fans could purchase food and

The Kansas City Chiefs, who have a separate stadium in the Truman Sports Complex, said Friday they will not ban tailgate parties before football games.

"We have no intention of doing away with tailgate parties. That's part of the fabric of the game," said Chiefs' spokesperson Bob Moore.

Herk Robinson, the Royals' executive vice president for administration, said the sheltered area would be a facility where fans could arrive early and purchase hamburgers, barbeque, soft drinks and perhaps beer.

The Jackson County Sports Complex Authority decided Thursday to pay an architectural consulting firm $12,000 plus expenses to design the pavilion.

Nicklaus takes Senior TPC

DEARBORN, Mich. (AP) - The first time Jack Nicklaus won a Senior event, he played well in a PGA Tour major the next

His second victory in three outings as an over-50 player came Sunday with a final-round, 8-under-par 64 to win the $1 million Senior TPC title by six strokes over Lee Trevino. Attention younger pro golfers: the U.S. Open, which Nicklaus has won four times, starts on Thursday. Nicklaus finished four trips around the 6,665-yard Dearborn Country Club course in 261, 27 under par, with record-tying 64s the last two days. The last of Nicklaus' 70 victories on the regular tour was the 1986 Masters, another major title.

Coming to the Senior TPC, Nicklaus had played only four competitive rounds in seven weeks. He hadn't planned on coming to Dearborn and he was the last player to enter.

Jones named to North team

K-State men's basketball player Askia Jones has been named to the North team for the 1990 Olympic Festival, which runs from July 6 to 11 in Minneapolis, Minn.

Jones' coach for the North will be former Wildcat mentor Lon Kruger, now the head coach at Florida.

The K-State forward is joined on the team by fellow freshmen and sophomores Ashraf Amaya of Southern Illinois, Damon Bailey of Indiana, Val Barnes of Butler County Community College, Terry Evans of Oklahoma, Damon Key of Marquette, Arriel McDonald of Minnesota, Eric Montross of North Carolina, J.R. Rider of Allen County Community College, Melvin Robinson of St. Louis Univ., and Dwayne Stephens of Mi-

Soviet basketball trip canceled

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) - A scheduled Big Eight basketball tour has been canceled because of the unexpectedly high cost of transmitting the games back to the United States.

Rich White, a spokesman for Dover Marketing Inc. of Atlanta, said Friday the company canceled the tour after discovering that satellite transmissions would cost $60,000 more than originally planned.

The firm handled negotiations for the trip with a Soviet sports federation.

"Coming 30 days before we were going to leave, it wasn't something we could correct," White said. "We were going to take a loss on the series, and the only appropriate thing to do at that point was to say, is it viable or not viable?" Big Eight Commissioner Carl James confirmed Thursday that Dover had canceled the trip. He said it appeared the decision also canceled a return trip by the Soviet national team to the

Georgia wins CWS title

OMAHA, Neb. (AP) — Freshman Stan Payne, a surprise starter, and ace Dave Fleming combined for a five-hitter, pitching Georgia to a 2-1 victory over Oklahoma State in the College World Series title game, as the Bulldogs won their first national championship.

The loss made Oklahoma State a loser in the title game for a record fifth time.

The Bulldogs (52-19) became the first team from Georgia or the Southeastern Conference to win the College World Series. Two SEC teams — Alabama in 1983 and Tennessee in 1951 lost in the finals.

Oklahoma State (56-17) entered the championship game having outscored opponents 35-8 in three College World Series wins and hitting .390.

Payne, a left-hander, limited the Cowboys to four hits in six innings. Fleming allowed one hit over the final three innings, dropping Oklahoma State's batting average to .349, still a tournament record. The previous record was .347 by Arizona State's 1977 national champions.

Iran seeks Shiite market

By The Associated Press

BAALBEK, Lebanon - In an odd mix of commercial boosterism and Islamic solidarity, Iran staged a huge trade fair here Sunday to show its support for Moslems fighting the Christians in Lebanon's 15-year-old civil war.

Among the wares on display were racy underwear to be worn under women's all-concealing chadors and children's books praising bloody Islamic martyrdom.

An Iranian deputy minister of commerce, identified only as Zaferian, said the event was designed to indicate the special concern that officials in Iran feel for the Moslems of Lebanon.

Lebanon is the only country outside Iran where the late Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's brand of Shiite Moslem fundamentalism has taken root. Although Lebanon's 1.2 million Shiites make up the country's largest single sect, they have long languished at the bottom of the social ladder.

Iran backs Hezbollah, or Party of God, an extremist faction that advocates the establishment of an Iranstyle Islamic state in Lebanon.

The trade fair was staged in this ancient Roman-built city in east Lebanon's Bekaa valley, which is Hezbollah's main stronghold. Some 2,500 Iranian Islamic Revolutionary Guards are based here.

The sprawling exhibition took up a seven-story building plus surrounding empty lots. Zaferian said 180 companies took part.

The event had many of the trappings of a standard commercial gathering.

"We do export the best, try us," read one company's Englishlanguage banner.

Other items weren't quite the usual trade-fair fare, however. The display by the Islamic Republic's

"Already now, we can say that the longing for freedom, democracy and a different order prevailed in this election," Havel told state TV just after the results were announced on national television.

Outside the Balkan countries of Bulgaria, which was voting Sunday, and Romania, Communists or ex-Communists generally have fared poorly at the polls.

The outcomes reflect the very different histories of six nations who share only the common past of four decades of Stalinism, with the voters choosing parties that most embody the varying national traditions.

In Czechoslovakia, Havel has assumed a role very similar to that of a man he often cites as a model, Thomas Garrigue Masaryk, the founder of modern Czechoslovakia in 1918. Masaryk's motto, "Truth will prevail," has given way to Havel's, "Truth and love must prevail over lies and natred.

Havel, a former dissident playwright who was a reluctant candidate for office before the revolution, has grown into the job. He seems virtually certain to be elected for the next two years by the new Parliament, which has 40 days to choose a president.

Pakistan democracy endangered violence in Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto's home province has taken 400 lives in a month, and many Pakistanis fear it endangers their country's brief experiment with Bhutto, who campaigned for a decade to free Pakistan from military rule, has been forced to call out the army in Sindh, her native province in southern Pakistan.

No one knows who is killing whom. Private armies, drug gangs and ethnic militias operate at will. Kidnappings, indiscriminate shootings and armed robbery are commonplace.

Police have arrested more than 3,300 people in a weeklong sweep of Sindh province, the heart of the country's financial and industrial base.

Critics and supporters agree a lasting solution depends on Bhutto's ability to make peace with an ethnic political movement that nearly brought down her government last year by withdrawing its support.

"Her long years of trials have conditioned her to think invariably in terms of 'them' and 'us," a government official said on condition of

"She has to stop playing party politics. She has to stop acting merely as the leader of the Pakistan People's Party and start being the prime minister of Pakistan. If she can't, she'll be lucky to last six months.

If Bhutto fails, observers say, more than her 18-month-old civilian government will be in danger.

Pakistan has spent more than half its 43 years under military rule, and concern is growing that the army will feel it necessary to take over again. At center stage in the bloody drama are the Mohajirs, Moslem Indians who moved into Pakistan during the 1947 partition that ended British colonial rule and made two

Most of the Mohajirs settled in Karachi and Hyderabad, the two largest cities of Sindh province. They were poor and landless, but welleducated and soon got the best jobs.

Although they make up only 6 percent of Sindh's 20 million people, the labor unions of the highly industrialized region.

Native Sindhis were increasingly shut out politically and economically, and their resentment led to street fighting.

Violence increased in the early 1980s because of the "Kalashnikov and heroin culture," a reference to the automatic rifles that entered the country during the war in Afghanistan and the growth of the drug trade.

On May 27, now called "Black Sunday," police tried to flush out Mohajir militants holed up in the old walled section of Hyderabad. The operation turned into a bloodbath that cost 180 lives and set off a fiveday wave of terror in Karachi that took nearly 200 more.

Bhutto faced accusations from all quarters that she had done too little to stop the bloodshed, and she called out the army.

Military officers agreed to arrest the troublemakers and seize their weapons regardless of ethnic or political affiliations. They insisted there be no interference from the provincial government, which is led by the prime minister's party.

In 1958 and 1977, the military jus-they dominate the cities and control tified coups on grounds politicians were corrupt and more interested in outmaneuvering each other than serving Pakistan.

Most observers agree a coup against Bhutto is unlikely. Since taking office in December 1988, she has built good relations with the army and its chief of staff, Gen. Mirza Aslam Beg.

Many officers also believe ruling the country corrupted the army and led to the involvement of some officers in the narcotics trade.

People are asking me, 'Why doesn't the army take over and save us from slaughter?' But I say that is the job of the present government," Beg said. "We can control the situation in three days, but that may not be a lasting solution. Martial law is not a permanent solution.' If the violence does not abate in a few months, however, many fear the army will have no choice.

Bush lays foundation for trade with Mexico

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - President George Bush dined privately with Mexican President Carlos Salinas de Gortari at the White House Sunday night and laid the groundwork for formal negotiations to lift trade barriers between the two countries.

A White House spokesperson said both presidents believe their countries would derive substantial and long-term benefits from a trade pact.

The statement, by White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater, stopped short of announcing the start of formal negotiations to forge a free trade pact, but administration officials said they expect that announcement to come today.

Both presidents declined to answer reporters' questions about free trade as they posed for photographers on the mansion's North Portico facing Pennsylvania Avenue.

They went inside for a reception with top U.S. and Mexican economic officials, including U.S. Treasury Secretary Nicholas Brady, Commerce Secretary Robert Mosbacher, trade representative Carla Hills, national security adviser Brent Scowcroft and Vice President Dan Quayle.

Later, the presidents dined alone in their second White House meeting in less than nine months.

Salinas, who is in the United States on a private visit to address the Business Roundtable, will meet with Secretary of State James Baker III and members of Congress on Monday, and will resume consultations on the free trade issue in those meetings, Fitzwater said.

"Both leaders believe that the United States and Mexico would derive substantial and long-term benefits from a comprehensive bilateral trade agreement," Fitzwater said. "They agreed that bilateral efforts to maximize trade and investment opportunities can and should complement the trade liberalization achieved in the Uruguay Round of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade."

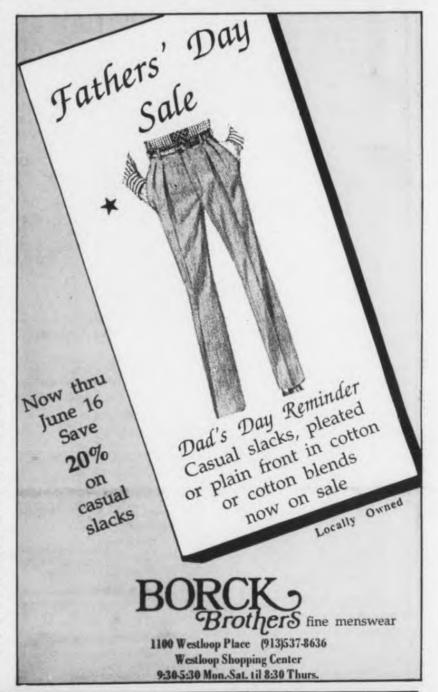

They also discussed the recent superpower summit, the fight against drug trafficking and other issues. Bush reiterated the U.S. desire for close cooperation with Mexican authorities in the drug fight, Fitzwater Administration officials said beforehand that the Bush-Salinas meeting would be followed by a formal announcement today of negotiations to create a free trade pact. The officials asked not to be identified.

Bush earlier Sunday declined to predict how long it might take to achieve a free trade agreement with

"I want to talk to him first before I can say on that," Bush told reporters as he walked off the golf course at Andrews AFB in suburban Maryland earlier Sunday. But he called the meeting with Salinas very important.

If successful, the trade negotiations could bring all of North America - 335 million people into a single market free of tariffs and other barriers to trade.
